N. J. Flynn, of the Subway theater, Kansas City, sends in a photograph of a lobby display for Vitagraph's "Mother's Roses." This was done with natural roses, and the whole was placed behind glass. It is an exceedingly good display, cleverly conceived and well done except for just one thing. Reference to the cut will show that the title of the play was evidently cut from a poster and a not very good job was done. It would have been better to have had a card with the title painted on by some good letterer. Just that one uneven slip of paper strikes a jarring note in what otherwise is an excellently planned novelty advertisement. It is on such small points that attention should be centered. It is like a man in correct evening dress with red flannel undershirt sleeves shrieking from beneath his immaculate cuffs. Much the same style of exhibit was planned some time ago for "Ashes of Roses" and other floral titles have given similar hints. All are good. Anything whatever that is a departure from the cut and dried announcement will gain immediate attention. The more novel the display the more attention will be attracted and the more favorable will be the impression, but merely cutting a lithograph to put a "real" necktie on some comedy character or giving Ford Sterling a chin tuft of crepe hair or even a scrap of black fur will create comment. If you are inventive or if your operator or usher or anyone around the house has good ideas, spend a little money and get it back in increased admission.

Paper.

A. H. Blair, of the National theater, Toledo, writes:

> I received the issue of "The World" this morning and have read the "Advertising for Exhibitors" column, for I always read this column first, as it gives me some mighty good suggestions.
> I am enclosing the program I promised you and I hope that it won't fare any worse with your criticism than the throw-away I sent you, this is the second week for it and I am still experimenting with paper, neither one of these enclosed suit me. Can you suggest a good paper? I set this up and printed it myself, except the program proper of the second issue, which I had set up by linotype to save myself that extra time.
> There is also a D. K. enclosed which I set up and printed. I got this door knob idea from The World.
> You will note by our program that we are still a "Three reels for a nickel" house, but there are only about three or four of us left here in Toledo, all the others are showing four and five reels for 5c. I am for three reels for 5c. and six reels for 10c.

Two programs are sent, one hand composition and one machine work. The latter is handier and cheaper, even though the type face is not so attractive, as they use matrices intended for newspaper composition, though not set to standard measure. If Mr. Blair is going to continue the use of machine work, he might find it cheaper to adapt his program to take the regulation thirteen or thirteen and a half em measurement. The dummy program is printed on a calendared paper. The other is little better than newspaper and is so absorbent that the front page cut and ornamental boarder are all mudded up. Even the straight type spreads a little. It is not good paper for the ink used. Better results might be had with a stiffer and less fluid ink, but it would be better to change the paper stock and get a little better quality. The absorbent news paper is all right where the job must be dry enough to handle as soon as it comes off the press, but for a program it is better to use a slightly surfaced paper, even at a slight increase in cost.

No matter what grade paper is used, a little better grade ink should be employed, for on the green stock the ink does not take well, though this may be due to a lack of enough pressure on the plates. If Mr. Blair will make inquiry of the people who set his machine stuff, they can give him the address of some paper people, if he cannot make a proper deal with a local warehouse, but he must then order in quantity.

If he will study the two programs he will see how the use of the absorbent paper closes up the fine hatching on his border and coarsens the lines of the cut. He has a good idea of display and the use of white space, but press work is harder than typesetting. His door knob is well done, for here the ink is of a grade that works well on the card.

One good point is that all printed matter bears the invitation to use the phone to get the daily program. Possibly that was suggested by the Kellette letter along the same lines. The other half of the idea is to have a person with an agreeable voice answer the phone. Get someone who can put some enthusiasm into the statement that the day's bill is a corker.

There are Some.

There are some New York managers who do a little house advertising. Will Rex sends in the program for the Manhattan Photoplay Theater Weekly. It has a sort of grey-brown cover so heavily "loaded" with clay that the ink smudges. The color itself suggests all of the joyousness of a funeral. It should be changed to a warmer tone. Only the front cover page is printed, the other three going to waste. It certainly should not add to the cost to print the back at the same time as the front and the inside form could be sold for more than enough to pay the cost of running it through the press. We are not stunned with admiration at the announcement that thirteen reels will be run on Sundays for ten cents, but the regular run is seven or eight. The lay-out is poor. With one exception the program is on the left instead of the right hand pages. The program is the feature and should be given the best of the display. The heading for the reading matter should be in larger type to give it importance, and the program should be boxed in.

It seems to us that it would help a little to coax some of the outside advertisers to smarten their ads. A drug store, for instance, announces that you will surely trade with them after an inspection. Why? There is nothing convincing in that advertisement. The store is three blocks from the theater. Why not a soda advertisement or some specialty or bargain that will test the pulling power of the program for the advertiser? Do not be content merely to get the advertisement. Try and have it do the advertiser some good.

Two Letters.

After a very long silence Anees M. Maluf, of the Lion theater, Glasgow, Ky., comes in with two letters only a day apart. Combining the pair we get:

> Enclosed please find two heralds of our dailies. You will take notice that we believe in the higher prices and give them their money's worth. We charge ten and fifteen cents for every Monday and Friday have five reels on these days and four all other days and charge ten cents for the balance of the week. On Saturday we have the "Hazards of Helen" and will very soon have the Kalem "Girl Detective" serial, but will not charge any extra for them. This printing is also done by me.
> Of course I can see many mistakes, but you will remember chance. I did not try to give you the best I had, put picked that the one doing the setting will not see every mistake until it is printed.

Do you think that it is right for us to criticise the city officials as we did in the two programs sent you yesterday? The papers were afraid to, but we were not; they were even afraid to say if what we said was true or not, they did not mention a word about it. This is not our first attempt on this line, but some time ago, in fact every year, we had to put with some evangelist coming to town and knocking on us, and we made it very lively for them. In every case we answered them in the paper, taking as much as two columns, and this and last week we have a revival in the same church, but so far have not had anything to say about us, as they understood that we will not shut.

Some time ago I promised you some of our (my) work, as you know we do all our printing in our plant, and the enclosed programs are some of our work. I have not been able to send you all the time but once in a while feel like we should; now all the printing you see on this paper, envelope and program is done by your humble servant. I have never done any other work at all, never was in a printing office at work, but from watching our printer for three months I had the nerve to try for myself, and as soon as the printer was absent, tried with what I came across; so please hammer for all you are worth. All the typesetting was done by me, of course; there was not much typesetting, but what you see is enough for one that only watched.

Will try to send you more later if you don't hammer too much. Take notice of the way the pages are stapled in the eight page program to secure two full pages in one printing. This is also my way.

As a rule it is one excellent thing to keep away from the municipal officials, as even Oscar Hammerstein found out, after costly experience, but circumstances here may have altered the case. It would appear that the constables were not on the job, and with public opinion behind the comment, it may have been a good thing for the house, though that remains to be demonstrated. The items read:

What Has Become of Our Law-Abiding Peaceable Officers? Can Any One Tell Us?

WHAT HAS BECOME OF OUR LAW-ABIDING PEACEABLE OFFICERS?

CAN ANY ONE TELL US?

Or do we have to call on the editors of our papers who praised them a little too soon; what about it? It is now up to Uncle Wm. Henry to either take back what he said some time ago about them or bring them to terms.

We dare say that in the history of Glasgow there has not been any more lawlessness than now.

It is about time to get awake Doc and get Wise, take a stroll a little before the chickens go to roost, and see what is going on on the streets of Glasgow, it is shameful, and a disgrace on any officer of the law. Glasgow never had any more peaceable or as harmless a pair of officers as we now have.

Where were you last Monday, Doc?, when at about 9 P. M. several farmers were looking for protection and asked for any one that looked like an officer and were told to look for you at home, but there they were told that you were not at home. We think the farmers should have asked if you were in BED they might have got the right answer but you surely were not at home. A good receipt if you are afraid that the bed will get cold these days will be to call at some drug store and buy you a hot water bottle, it wil keep the bed warm for you till you get back.

WE HAVE FOUND THEM!

What appeared on this page last week did not go without effect, but its effect was noticeable with the appearance of our officers on their dtuy later than ever before and the condition of the streets on Saturday night was better than has been for some time. Keep it up Doc that's what you are expected to do.

The reason for the notice given last week is this: Several ladies have been complaining to us about the many drunken loafers on the streets late at night and that it is not safe for the ladies to be out late, a condition which effects not only us but every business that is open at night. But we are GLAD to see the difference made already.

The eight page stunt he speaks of may be useful to others. He uses the cuts for The Master Key supplied by the Universal. These cover two of his pages. In ordinary make-up it would be necessary to saw the cuts apart and separate them by reglet to get the spacing for the binding. Instead of this he prints the eight as two fours, getting the cuts in the centre of each form.

A four is printed as two two page forms. His forms are made up one and four, two and three, five and eight and six and seven, being side stitched as two signatures.

It looks as though there was trouble now and then with the ink or the impression. Get plenty of impression, which means pressure against the paper while it is against the type. Don't be content merely to get ink over on the paper. Make it print right. As the light news sheets are not as well printed as the heavier card covers it is more probably the impression than the ink. It is easier to pick up type setting through observation than to learn how to print in the same way.

Mr. Maluff has some well selected type and knows how to put it together for the most part. He even does two color work and gets his register. We'll be glad to see more of his stuff and hope he does not take so long a sleep this time.

Mr. Upstill's Way.

Eugene A. Upstill, of the Star theater, Long Pine, Neb., writes:

You will probably have noticed that I have not sent you any programs for a few weeks. Here is my idea of it: I get them for a while with programs and when they get tired I try them with something else. I have used dodgers the past two weeks. I enclose one on today's feature. I noticed in a late issue that an exhibitor is complaining that another house runs old stuff, yet does the business. Why doesn't he tell the people what he is doing. You can't do business unless you tell them that you run quality where you offer a smaller number of reels than your competitor.

That's sound business talk. It is in line with what we have written before and probably shall write again. If you want to fight a six reel show with a four reel program, tell why four good reels are better than six rainy ones. Give the dates of your respective programs. You can get the dates particularly if you start in just after the conclusion of a volume of this paper and have the Index.

The dodger Mr. Upstill sends is for the Thanhouser Uncle Tom's Cabin, but most of it is given to an explanation as to why he has to charge a higher admission. Others might meet a troubled situation with equal frankness and to the same advantageous result.

Express, both ways on film	1.50
Internal revenue for shipping	.02
Advertising, rent on posters, express on posters, heralds, dodgers.	4.75
Total.	$26.27

Remember we have to pay for our regular service also. And it is not two or three year old dollar per reel service.

Do we show you cheap films at a high price? Judge for yourself, from the above.

But if you give figures, follow Mr. Upstill's example and stick to figures that cannot be controverted. If you advertise that you pay $50 for a reel and the other man can show an offer of $25 you will not only lose that point, but others. Nothing you say will be believed.

More Hennegan Covers.

The Hennegan company send in some additions to their line of program covers in color. These are sold so reasonably and are to be had in such variety that it pays to use them in preference to regular stock if you are in their freight radius. But the thing to do is to get them in quantity and not a week's supply at a time, have them come by freight and not express and you save money. The only thing we do not like about them is that now and then some exhibitor tries to make us think that it his own idea and not the Hennegans!

Forty Cents.

The Morningside theater, New York, sends in an odd coupon card with a very tasteful announcement of the opening. For the opening day and the following week they issue a program perforated into coupons, each of which is good for five cents toward the admission price. It is an odd scheme but better than sending one or more free tickets, since it gets the patron in the habit of paying from the start. Considering the amount of type and the size of the card (five by eight inches) the printer has done an excellent job. It is blue on blue and the announcement and envelope are also blue, perhaps a house color. The card and announcement both impress the recipient with the suggestion of elegance. It is worth while to spend a little more money and getting out something you do not have to be ashamed of. Several dollars could have been saved on the cost of this job, but it would have cost the house a lot in the long run. For the extra money they get a running start.

Uses a Trailer.

In the two houses in New Rochelle run by the Thanhouser players, John William Kellette gets away from the usual good night cut by using a printed trailer "Good night. Come again." Spliced to the end of the last reel. This flashes without interruption and is less of a shock than a slide would be.

Will You Help?

After talking about it for some time, we've at last started on a book on advertising. We want to get a few photographs of extra good lobby displays, novelty ideas in advertising and advertisements. Will you help, if you can, by sending in a photograph good enough to make a first-class cut from?

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

INQUIRIES.

Questions concerning photoplay writing addressed to this department will be replied to by mail if a fully addressed and stamped envelope accompanies the letter which should be addressed to this department. Questions should be stated clearly and should be typewritten or written with pen and ink. Under no circumstances will manuscripts or synopses be criticised, whether or not a fee is sent therefor.

A list of companies will be sent if the request is made to the paper direct and not to this department, and a return, stamped envelope is enclosed.

Oh, Say It Not?

ASKING for books lately we listed all we had and added "if you've been stung" with any of the fake books we would buy them if the price was right. And at once we began to get letters asking why we listed the Leeds-Esenwein books and Phillips' in the list of books that are stings. One correspondent even said that "Stung" was the caption of the paragraph—which it was not.

We have all of the good books on the subject. What we want to do now is to add to the list all of the junk stuff, but we did not offer the list as a collection to be avoided. We listed the good with the bad merely to show what we had and did not want.

It all goes to show why some students of photoplay get ahead so slowly. They do not understand what they read and so it does them no good. It also explains why we often write with more force then seeming kindness. You cannot crack ivory with a feather pillow and we want to reach the ivory headed as well as the intelligent because they need us more.

And Still the Light.

To quote the psalmist or Moody and Sankey or someone, "while the light holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return." One of them hit our trail instead of Billy Sunday's the other day and wrote:

> Been about a year finding out what was wrong with my multiples. Expensive lesson! I've been placing crime interest first and human interest last. Which is to say I wrote my stuff around a crime, instead of making the crime an incidental. Some of my stuff was worked right—and I sold it all. I have always sold good stuff—really good stuff, I mean. Now that I've learned my lesson I've changed my method. Am sending off the first real story I've written since the Lord knows when. I have five out, three of which are good—but nothing like my latest.

And we wrote back that he had been about five years learning this valuable lesson and we hoped it took this time. To prove it was more than a year we called his attention to page 103 of Technique of the Photoplay. If you have the book read that chapter over again.

Crime in itself is neither thrilling nor interesting. It is a cheap way of getting a pseudo punch and is the lifesaver of the unthinking. The real author can get interest through his appeal to the human side and there is a long list of the strongest sort of plays that do not deal with crime at all. And the more you play up the crime, the more prominent you make it, the less chance you stand of selling it.

We used to know a comedian who had a roar like a walrus trying to imitate a lion with a bad cold. He got a laugh every time he used it for several years, but people got tired of it. People are tired of crime themes and want stories instead. In passing, many studios are afraid of crime stuff because of the present censorship crusade. There are two good reasons for getting down on the anxious seat along with the writer quoted above. Be a writer and not a police court reporter.

Solid Sense.

This from an old timer is all of the law and all of the prophets:

> I am working on this line only in the evenings now and am taking my time in an effort to turn out good stuff in place of a lot of worthless junk. I believe it pays. To date I have written twenty-five, of which seventeen have been sold and four others are at their port of first call, so I don't consider that I am a has been just yet. Comedy only is nailed at my masthead now. I did write two dramas among the twenty-five, but I have retired one of them and will retire the other as soon as it returns from its present trip.

It is the man who sends out a little good stuff rather than a lot of junk that makes the sales. Some of the junk may stick, but the postage on the rest eats up the profit. The real artist gets more for a single painting than the novice gets for a year of pot-boilers. It's the same here.

Here's Another.

Now comes the Selig company with a prize contest, but not the cut and dried script competition. They want a really novel idea for giving interest to a pictorial record of their trip to the two fairs. The matter below is official. There are no other details.

> The Selig Polyscope Company wishes an idea for an unusual sort of scenario. Under the direction of the Selig Company, the Selig Special will leave Chicago on Thursday, July 8. The Selig Special is planned in order to give exhibitors, scenario writers, newspapermen and other friends of the Selig Company an opportunity to visit the two California Expositions, the Selig Jungle-Zoo at Los Angeles, Denver, Salt Lake City, Santa Barbara, the Royal Gorge, Heart of the Orange Groves and elsewhere. The sight-seeing tour will last nearly three weeks.
> It is planned to have written a scenario of the entire trip the scenes for which will be taken by special cameramen on board the Selig Special, and the motion picture in which all the guests of the Selig Special are to participate as characters, will later be released by the Selig Company.
> Original ideas for this scenario are wanted. If a unique working plan can be devised the Selig Company will award as a prize one free trip to the Exposition. The Selig Company does not obligate itself to accept any one scenario. The idea must be practical or other means will be taken to film the story of the Selig Movie Special.
> The rules for this contest follow:
> Synopsis only must be submitted not to exceed 300 words.
> No detailed action, but just the idea in synopsis form is desired.
> Write on one side of the paper and use the typewriter.
> Put full name and address in upper left hand corner of the manuscript.
> No manuscripts will be returned.
> No correspondence can be entered into regarding this contest. Complete details of the journey of the Selig Special can be obtained from the Selig Weekly Press News. A copy will be mailed for a two-cent stamp.
> Contract closes noon Saturday, May 1.
> Manuscripts not conforming to the rules will not be considered.
> Address all synopses to the Selig Movie Special Editor, 20 East Randolph street, Chicago, Ill.

The Market.

One result of the war has been the awakening of the manufacturers. Most of them simply ambled along, content to put out whatever their producers gave them. The combined markets would give a return to almost anything. Then the market contracted and manufacturers suddenly realized that things were different—and had been different for a very long time. They started to find out the trouble and most of them are still searching, but they'll find it in the course of time and in many ways the present slump will prove to be the best thing that has ever happened for the real photoplay writers. And it is beginning to look as though the one and two-reel story produced with the same attention to detail that marks the best of the features is going to be the best market. As Mr. Bush recently pointed out, the feature is getting too common and is losing its attraction.

How?

Emmett Campbell Hall, or at least the Lubin press department, announces that his new serial will have no leaders, "most of them being cut in dialogue" or letters or other inserts. Cut in leaders are cut in leaders, with the accent on the "leaders." They are less intrusive then the straight leader, but we fail to see that this is such a remarkable discovery, since it is given in many text books. Just for that matter it is only a little more than five years when we suggested the cut in leader and were regarded with pity.

Mr. Hall, or rather the press agent, would make it seem that the way to avoid all trouble is to use all cut in leaders, and a lot of beginners, eager to find a reason for their failures, will decide that the way to sell is to use all cut ins. This is bad teaching, and we think that Mr. Hall himself would be the last to preach such a gospel. The best leader to use is the leader that is called for, whether this is cut in or put between scenes.

And it must be remembered that Mr. Hall is one of the old masters and can do things that the beginner should not try to do.

Introducing Mr. Tucker.

Jac Tucker (and death to the printer who spells it "Jack") is to be with us, having accepted a position on the Lubin staff. Mr. Tucker, with his gifted wife, Eva Williams, gave vaudeville two of its real heart interest comedies in "Skinny's Finish" and "Driftwood," and only his modest diffidence has kept him from making a greater name for himself. As soon as he learns the ropes and how to pull them he is going to be one of the elect. He will both write and act for the Hotaling section of the Lubin company.

Polite Comedies.

We are a little afraid that in an effort to swing the pendulum over to "polite" comedies some of the authors are going to get too polite. When an editor asks for "polite," "parlor," or other styles of comedy, and adds that no slapstick is wanted, do not get the idea that no comedy action is wanted or that no comedy situation is desired, but merely the comedy idea. Get good comedy business, because not all comedy business is of the slapstick order. If Bill bumps into John and both sprawl on the sidewalk, that is slapstick, but if Bill stops to pick up Nell's handkerchief and drops his silk hat and John, racing to catch a car, steps on it, it is comedy business, but if Bill runs after John and smears him all over the camera lines, then it becomes slapstick again. Polite action is not violent, but polite action is action and not thought, though in polite comedy action alone is not as strong as when backed by idea. If Bill's smashed hat is incidentaly it is not screamingly funny, but if we know that he borrowed it from Henry and he won't eat lunches until he gets the money to pay for it and we've already shown that he is trying to cut a dash in borrowed clothes, then the destruction of the hat is not merely damage to property, it is the foundation, in action, for a comedy idea. It is possible to evolve bright comedy action without slapstick. It is possible but rather difficult to most people.

Studying the Screen.

It is important that you study effects and how to get them, else how can you obtain the effects you want? A well known author who feels like selling one of the automobiles when he gets only a three figure check for a story, came on the carpet the other day. He admitted that he had written a lot of stuff that was not picture punch at all. He had given a good story and the use of his name in return for the check, but he did not know enough about pictures to know how to get punch, and yet he was hired and the stuff was made. And any man who about that time could have stepped in with additional material for the series would have been most welcome, and some of the smaller people could have put in the stuff. You may not feel that you stand much chance against the great big headliners, but a budding author who will study does stand a far better chance of making continuous money from a studio competition with men who sell past performances instead of impending films, so stick and study and some day you may have a big name. You seldom see Walter Bunting's name in the trade papers, but several editors welcome his submissions, knowing that he is a practiced hand at the better sort of comedy.

Trick Stuff.

Don't get the idea that you can replace plot with trick and light effects and get away with it. Light effects are good in their place where the results gained will more than compensate for the time and trouble taken, but they must supplement, not replace, plot or the result will be disappointment, either to you or to the editor who takes the story for production.

Trick effects are used mostly in comedy, but a story written around trick effects is not a story at all, but some incident, more or less interesting, yet not strong enough to hold the attention. There is a decided tendency, particularly on the part of beginners, to resort to trickery to hide a poverty of imagination, but mostly it is time wasted.

From One Prize Winner.

The following letter from William M. Marston, Harvard College, winner of the prize offered by the Edison Company for the best scenario offered in their recent college contest, is interesting in the sidelight it throws on his methods of work and his views on the future of the photoplay:

> In reply to your very kind questions I would say: (1) I first took up scenario writing during my second year at Harvard—the year 1912-1913. I purchased a book on the subject and spent considerable time at the picture shows studying the plots, style of pictures produced by different companies, and the visual effects possible with moving pictures. I sold several scenarios to various companies, but toward the end of the year became too busy to pursue the work further. I did nothing more in scenario writing until the present year, when I noted your advertisement of the College Contest in the "Harvard Crimson." I began to attend the picture theatres again, looking especially for Edison films. I then wrote three scenarios which I submitted for your consideration. My inspiration for the plot of "Jack Kennard, Coward" arose, in the first place, from a systematic search for a "big" situation as a climax which would contain plenty of action. I then built the plot with the purpose of consistently leading up to the climax. The ideas in the plot itself were drawn from various incidents of personal experience here at college.
> I can state definitely at this time that I shall continue scenario writing as a regular avocation during the next three years. Although I have had some success with short stories, the financial advantage is decidedly on the side of photoplays, and since I shall enter Harvard Law School next fall for a three-year course the financial consideration is a very important one to me.
> I have recently sold scenarios to various film companies, but this method is inefficient, in that it is impossible to keep in touch with the needs of all companies at once. I am, therefore, seeking a contract or agreement whereby I write exclusively for one company, said company dictating the style of scenario or subject required.
> I have, further, one idea which I want to present to you. It is my belief that, just as the individual picture play has progressed from impossible melodrama to high class drama of realistic type, so will the serial picture evolve from detective plots and melodramatic farces to legitimate life-dramas (in which every "episode" may be crammed with interest and action) or purposive plots of fairy-story sort.

A Diagnosis.

Evidently there are others who have had brain fag. One correspondent writes to announce his revival and adds: "I don't think my brain died, as one correspondent expresses it, but believe me, it was awful sick."

Dodging the Censors.

In figuring on how to dodge the censorship remember it is not so much the act as the result, sometimes. Of course the frankly repellant action is ordered out because of itself, but sometimes a seemingly unobjectionable act may be cut because of the action it brings. Just the other day a director complained because a script had been cut down. A college boy, masquerading as a girl, shows rather more stocking than a perfect lady should. "But it was a man, and everyone knew it was a man," argued the director. He lost sight of the fact it was not the single act of exposure that caused the cut, but the actions of the father of one of the other boys, whose ready entrance into the trap formed the plot of the story. The action, in itself, was not condemned so much as the responsive action it elicited. It is well to bear such matters in mind when figuring effects.

Old Stuff.

It was a shock when one of our observation pupils came in with a lesson synopsis that was nothing more than a vaudeville act that we had seen perhaps forty times. We wondered just what sort of an idiot he thought we were, even if he didn't know we had seen vaudeville until we were sick of it. Another man took the trouble to bring in an old joke and a second old whiskered wheeze came in by mail.

No editor is in the market for time-honored jokes or "nigger acts." When you see them on the screen there is a reason, as in a recent Kalem release, "You'll find out," which was written in the office to stop a gap. You won't sell and you will write yourself down a thief and a swindler, and you'll make the editor sore at the inference that you think he is an empty headed ass. Use a little judgment, anyhow.

Cut In and ———.

James K. P. Scott offers the suggestion that it is tautological to use a cut in leader and then permit the actor to whom the sentence is ascribed to frame the words either before or after the leader. It is worse than tautological—it is cussedly careless, but what can you expect of the sort of cutting editors they have? When a man starts to speak a cut in leader, the leader itself should be the sentence. It should not be a repetition of that sentence. When the player starts speaking the leader should flash and before the rest of the scene is cemented on, enough of the film should be cut out to have the action resumed on the close of the speech.

In the First Ten Feet.

Alice C. Brown contributes these words of real helpfulness.

> Had a good lesson, indirectly, on comedy business the other day; came from a man who used to be on some circuit, lecturing "A hundred laughs in a hundred minutes," and if he didn't get the laughs, he forfeited more than he got if he did. He said that it was important to get the first laugh in the first ten seconds, and it didn't matter much how you got it; he is now teaching commercial arithmetic in the High School, and only laughs on Fridays. Seems to me it applies just as well to pictures; get the first laugh in the first ten feet, and it doesn't matter a whole lot how to get it. It sort of limbers up the laughing center, so to speak, and makes things easier; and it dosen't have to be a great big laugh either to get the audience to settle down to enjoyment of the prospect. The trouble about writing it. I can think all manner of funny things, but when I come to get it down, it merely seems silly or stupid, like the drop of soapy water after you pinch a bubble. Humor is such an evanescent thing; the mere saying it seems to take the life out of the joke. As you say, I can invent the stuff all right, but I don't always know what to do with it.

It is a good point to note that the audience should be gained to laughter quickly, even by some interpolated action, but it is more important to note that written comedy sounds foolish and absurd and not at all funny. If it reads entertainingly it is not funny on the screen because you have expended your effort on the words instead of on the action. Most editors learn to shy away from the script that reads well. They want a script that will look well and they can tell from the stupid words what the action will be.

Reformed.

Bill Kitchell writes he is single spacing his scenes and double spacing in between because it looks better and makes a less bulky package. He doesn't talk about saving postage, because he knows that the stamp bill is an investment, but he finds out now what others knew long since, that the single spaced script looks smarter and at the same time cuts down bulk as well as postage. In a two or three reel story the reduction of the bulk not only looks less formidable to the editor and director, but it travels better in the mails and is less liable to break through its container and get lost.

Manufacturer's Notice.

IT IS AN established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until the excellence of such articles have been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two or three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending four cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department, one dollar.

Both the first and second set of questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form, the second half being seventy-six in number. Either booklet may be had by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor, or both for 40 cents. Cannot use Canadian stamps. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy of these questions. You may be surprised at the number you cannot answer without study.

Question No. 80.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Show, in detail, how you would connect four 110 volt, 25 ampere, fixed rheostats so as to get approximately sixty amperes at the arc from a D. C. 110 volt supply. How would you connect two of them on 220 volts and how many amperes would you get? Supose you connected all four of them in series on 220 volts, how many amperes would you get? How would you connect all four on 220 volts so as to get about 25 amperes? Suppose you connected all four in series on 220 volts, what would you get? Illustrate the various connections with sketches.

Roll of Honor on Question No. 74.

The Roll of Honor on Question No. 74 consists of Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; John Solar, Watertown, New York; A. C. Stewart, Waitsburg, Washington; B. M. Spencer, Attleboro, Massachusetts; Touro Glucksman, New Orleans; M. W. Larmour, Waco, Texas, and Montreal, Canada.

The answer of M. W. Larmour has been selected for publication.

Reply to Question No. 74.

By M. W. Larmour, Waco, Texas.

The Question:

Would you prefer a wire coil or a cast iron grid rheostat, and why? With current at 6 cents per k.w., how much would it cost per hour to operate a 30 ampere arc on 550 volt supply, using resistance? You have a 110 volt supply, and 110 volt, 25 ampere rheostat, and a 70 volt, 15 ampere rheostat. How many amperes would you get with the two connected in multiple? Give the rule for figuring resistance in series with a projection arc.

The Answer:

I prefer a grid to a wire coil rheostat for the following reasons:

It is as a rule more strongly made.

It does not deteriorate so rapidly.

With a coil rheostat the capacity decreases with use. This does not occur with a grid.

The coils of a wire coil rheostat have more of a tendency to sag together or against the frame causing a ground or short circuit. The electrical connections between the different sections of a grid are better and therefore do not overheat, causing a rise in the resistance and eventually burning entirely off as frequently as in a wire coil rheostat.

In a wire coil rheostat, as a rule, the coils are connected to some form of bridge or jumper with screws. After use, especially if the coils are overheated, these screws will stick and become brittle, making their removal extremely difficult. This trouble is done away with in a grid rheostat by clamping the whole resistance elements together with long insulated bolts and placing the screws which connect the adjusting switch under the coils.

It would cost 550 × 30 = 16,500 watts, or 16.5 k.w. × $.06 = $.99 per hour to operate a 30 ampere arc on 550 volt current through resistance.

With two rheostats in series the amperage at the arc would be about 16.

Explanation: The resistance equals the volts divided by the amperes. It is expressed as a formula thus: $\frac{E}{C} = R$ or on projection circuits $\frac{(1E - aE)}{c} = R.$

E stands for electromotive force or volts. C is current or amperes and R is the resistance expressed in ohms.

1E means the line voltage and aE the arc voltage which I have assumed to be 50 volts.

Substituting the known values we have: $\frac{(110 - 50)}{25} = 2.4$ ohms, which is the resistance of the 110 volt, 25 ampere rheostat.

And: $\frac{(70 - 50)}{15} = 1.3$ ohms = resistance of the 70 volt, 15 ampere rheostat.

The resistance of both in series will be 1.3 and 2.4 = 3.7 ohms.

The volts divided by the ohms equals the ampere, so $\frac{(110 - 50)}{3.7} =$ 16 amperes.

Therefore the two rheostats connected in series would deliver 16 amperes through a projection arc circuit.

They could not be connected in multiple on a circuit of more than 70 volts without burning out the 70 volt rheostat.

To find the resistance to be used in series with a projection arc, divide the line voltage minus the arc voltage by the amperes desired. The answer will be in ohms.

New Screen Manufacturer.

The Minusa Cine Products Company, 300 North Broadway, St. Louis, Mo., has entered the market as screen manufacturers, their products being named "Minusa." They have forwarded samples of their gold fibre, Minusa No. 2 and Minusa No. 3 screens. These surfaces appear to be good, except for the No. 3, which I am afraid might have a tendency to create halation, since the surface is very bright. The No. 2, however, does not possess this fault, and I may be wrong about the effect of the No. 3. Certainly the gold fibre would produce good results for those who like the yellow finish. Personally, the editor has never particularly favored gold surfaces, though there are things to be said for them, the main point in their favor being the fact that while it tends to cut light brilliancy it unquestionably does add a soft tone to the picture, and moreover, has a considerable effect in the elimination of flicker, but this latter is due wholly and entirely to the reduction of brilliancy. It must be understood that anything which increases light brilliancy also increases tendency to flicker, and vice versa.

We have every reason to believe the Minusa Cin Products Company to be a responsible institution. We are not informed as to what guarantee they give with their screens, but presume it to be ample.

A New Lighting System.

Those who have the second edition of the Handbook will see, by turning to page 402, a recommendation the editor made for theater lighting illustrated. This recommendation was made and illustrated in the department more than four years ago. I have always believed the principle involved to be the correct one for auditorium illumination, provided it be carefully and properly carried out. This now seems to be in process of performance in the new Shado-Lite which is being put out by the Shado-Lite Manufacturing Company. By a system of carefully arranged fixtures and reflectors the light is thrown as per illustration, and it will be observed that the greater percentage of the light falls on the backs of the seats and the backs of the audience, and none at all, except a slight reflection from the back wall, on the screen. This, it seems to me, is an excellent application of the idea set forth in the Handbook, and, while I have not seen it tried out in practice, I am predisposed to believe it to be a thoroughly practical and excellent proposition. I will have more to say on the subject as soon as I have seen Shado-Lite actually tried out in practice.

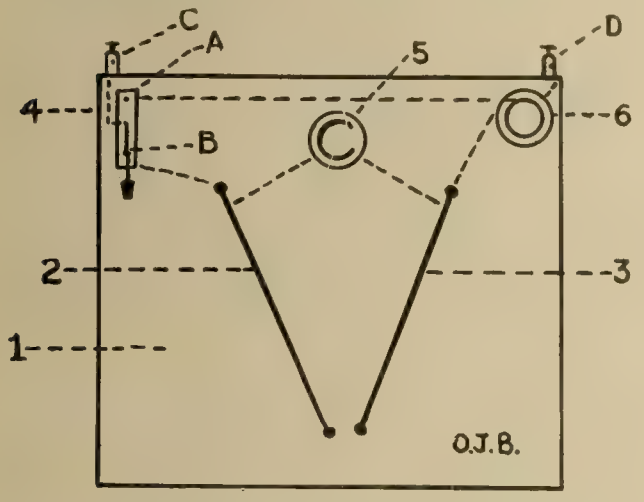
Fuse Tester.

O. J. Bilodean, Stevens Point, Wisconsin, says:

I am sending herewith sketch of what I think is a good fuse tester. Am running a machine at The Gem in this city. We have two machines, a Powers Six A and a Powers Six. We dissolve the leader of one film into the preceding one, thus putting on a continuous show. The house seats 400, and we run four reels of Mutual for five and ten cents. I don't know what we small-town men would do without the department and the handbook. Who takes your place when you are sick? You certainly cannot have a duplicate. Where can a fellow get a set of books that would help him dope out the answers to those questions?



In the sketch 1 is a piece of hard wood; (That would not do, old man, you would have to have asbestos board or slate. Ed.) 2 and 3 are solid No. 6 copper wires fastened to the base by screws passing through porcelain insulators to hold the wires up off the base; 5 is a plug socket partly cut away to allow of inserting a plug fuse for testing without screwing it in; 6 is a keyless wall socket containing a small lamp; 4 is a single-pole, double-throw knife switch; C-D are binding posts to be connected to wires of opposite polarity at any convenient point. From A to 6 is another wire connecting the two points, so that the lamp in socket 6 can be tested at any time by throwing over switch 4.

The operation of the fuse tester is, I think, self-explanatory, and it would be a very convenient arrangement too, provided it itself be protected by fuses, so that in case of accidental short circuit between wires 2 and 3 there would be no harm done except to a fuse. The slanting wires, of course, enables one to test cartridge fuses of different length.

As to my getting sick, why, my dear sir, I don't have time to get sick. Some day I am going to get mad and get sick anyhow, just for spite, but for five years I have been on the job every week. I must again call attention to one important point which many operators who oppose the publication of books and projection departments carefully overlook, viz: in these small towns it would be utterly impossible to employ a competent operator, without charging the people a price several times greater than that charged in cities. Practically the employment of a competent operator would make the showing of moving pictures absolutely out of the question in small towns. If there were no works of instruction the small town men would be unable to put on a picture in decent shape, and therefore literally millions of people would suffer through injury to their only source of theatrical amusement. Don't you dog-in-the-manger men really feel that you are asking considerable when you seek to have the avenues of knowledge closed for your own selfish benefit (and it is purely imaginary benefit at that) when such closure would operate to injure at least twenty-five million people. Rather nervy on your part, isn't it? What?

Oh, by-the-way, the best thing I can cite you is my own handbook, and the Hawkins' Electrical Guide, the latter six volumes at one dollar per volume. It can be had for one dollar down and one dollar per week. Send me the money and a stamped envelope and I will forward the order to the publishers if you wish.

Appeal for Financial Help.

Local Union No. 106, I. A., Marion, Indiana, writes as follows:

Union operators of Marion are to give a benefit for Brother Carl Ratliff, operator in the Luna Lite theater, this city. Brother Ratliff has been operating twelve years; he is unable to perform other labor by reason of a crippled leg, and recently his lungs have become affected. Doctors have told him if he can get out of the operating room he has a good chance to get well; otherwise his days are numbered. We have only a small organization, and are unable to do much, therefore we ask help from operators in trying to give this brother a chance for his life. He is married and has a wife and a daughter four years old depending on him. We know the Moving Picture World reaches all operating rooms and theater managers, therefore, through the department, we ask those who will, to give us help in this cause. If every operator reader will send a small amount it will give to Brother Ratliff a chance for his life, and to his wife and daughter a chance for future happiness. Those wishing to aid will please send the money to the man himself, Carl Ratliff, P. O. Box 324, Marion, Ind.

The foregoing communication comes on union stationery, with the seal of the union attached. I would suggest that 25 cents will not hurt any of you. You would not mind blowing that sum in on some trivial pleasure. Get busy and send a quarter—more if you can spare it. But if lots of you send that amount it will mean a great deal to Brother Ratliff. It is a good cause, boys, and some day the time may come when you will need help, and need it mighty badly too. A quarter is not much to you, but to a man fighting for life handicapped by the lack of money it means a lot. Get busy. Don't say, "Yes I will do that," and then lay the paper down and forget it, "do it now." I've sent mine quarter, how many of you are "wid me"?

Be sure Your Idler Is in Line.

M. Linebough, Walla Walla, Washington, encloses sample of film with indentations between the sprocket holes, and says he has had this happen rather often. It always starts from a patch with worn sprockets.

I would suggest to the brother that he see to it that the idler of his lower sprocket is exactly square with the sprocket. That is probably the seat of his trouble.

Jumps Something Awful.

S. H. Freeman, Urbana, Illinois, manager of the Princess theater, writes:

Have just opened a new house and one of the first things I did was to get your Handbook for my operator. We are having trouble and would like very much to have you help us out. Have two new Powers 6A machines; A C current; distance of projection 96 feet; picture 16 feet 8 inches. The picture jumps something awful. Have been trying to get a 5¼ Gundlach lens but am informed they do not make them. Have ordered meniscus-bi-convex condensers, and a 50 ampere Wagner converter. Do you think it is the A. C. that is causing the trouble

It is very difficult to diagnose your trouble, since the data you send has no bearing on the matter at all. First, I would refer you to General Instruction No. 3, page 214 of the Handbook. That probably is the seat of the difficulty. Dirt on the face of the intermittent sprocket will cause the picture to jump. It is also possible that the floor of your operating room is not solid, and that the jump on the screen is due to that fault. In this connection I would refer you to "Rigid Floor," page 70, of Handbook. It is also possible you are using old films, which are in bad condition, or that the films are badly dried out and shrunken. I would suggest that you describe the jump. If it is regular, four times to each turn of the crank, that is one thing; if it jumps irregularly, sidewise and up and down, that is something else again. Be sure your tension springs are tight enough. See General Instruction No. 9, page 216 of the Handbook. No, A. C. has nothing to do with the jump. If there is excessive flicker why that is something else again. Describe your trouble more carefully, my brother.

Syracuse Operators Select Officers.

The newly-organized Syracuse local have elected the following officers: President, William J. Caron; vice-president, Joseph Flaherty; recording secretary, George Spicer; secretary-treasurer, Burton Barton, business agent, R. D. Woodford.

Light Problems.

C. P. Wiseman, Seminole, Pennsylvania, says:

I have been running a Powers Six A seven months and getting a real good picture. Line voltage is 250 d.c., through rheostats. Power is included in rent of building, so there is no kick on current waste. Distance from projection lens to screen is 56 feet; width of picture 12 feet; objective 4¾-inch e.f.; back condenser 6½; front 7½; screen aluminum finish over plaster wall with a black border. What is the correct distance of arc from back condenser; also the aperture? What is the cause of a "left handed ghost" on my screen? Don't know what else to call it. Instead of a dark spot it is a white one, about the size of the ghost which comes when the lower carbon gets in front of the crater. I get a good light on the entire screen but this extra brightness in the center is a puzzle, though it does not harm the picture appreciably. Regarding the printing of the questions and answers in book form, have you thought of this? Many operators work evenings only, which, of course, does not pay enough to live on, therefore, they work at some other employment during the day and have no time to study, but would have time to study the questions and answers if arranged in handy form.

First, Brother Wiseman, I do not agree that the operator who works evenings should be compelled to work also in day time. That would mean, at the best, eleven or twelve hours' work a day, and the day for the eleven or twelve stunt is past, or at least it ought to be. The operator must make his living at operating, even though the theatre only runs evenings. As to the lens matter, you are twisted there. A 4¾-inch e.f. would not project a 12-foot picture at 56 feet. Your arc should be located approximately 3½ inches from the back surface of the condenser. Assuming you have a 4¾-inch e.f., as you say you have, Mr. Griffiths gives the following: Distance from aperture to center combination of condensers 11⅞ inches; back condenser 6½; front condenser 8½ inches with ⅛-inch space between the two lenses. Distance of arc from center of combination of condensers 4.48.

Mr. Simon Arkin did not give data in his table covering your proposition. As to the white ghost, it is a pretty hard proposition, provided you state the matter correctly. A white ghost is sometimes caused by reflection, but in this case I believe you are getting a faint image of the crater, though just why you are getting it I could not say. The patches you send in are an outrage on decency.

Wants Low Current Bills.

P. R. Day, Cainsville, Ontario, says:

> With congratulations on the excellence of the department, here is something which stirs up my ire. I have 105 square feet of screen, d.c., at 10 cents per k.w.-hour, and the powers that be insist that the current bill be not more than thirty-five dollars per month, running just a trifle under seven hours a day, six days a week, with the arc going all the time as there is no vaudeville. I have left that position, however. It was in Brandon, Manitoba. Here in Cainsville juice is cheaper, and one house uses 550 volts through a rheostat. I wish you would give managers a little lecture on current bills. Some of them demand impossibilities. The houses in the next city, 30,000 population, Brantford by name, don't seem very prosperous, nor do the people seem to know one brand of film from another. Perhaps this may be laid at the door of the operating room, and I think it is, judging by the results in three of the houses; a fourth leaves a good impression, except in the matter of light; it was well handled but there was not enough of it. As a rule, other things being equal, projection is better in small towns where two or three operators are gathered together than in the large cities.

With regard to current bills it is not to be expected that a manager will stand for any waste. It would not be right that he should, but the question enters just where does true economy end and waste begin. I am thoroughly convinced that it never, under any circumstances, pays to use less than 40 amperes a.c. or 25 amperes d.c. at the arc. That in my judgment should be the absolute minimum for the projection of moving pictures in theaters, where the size seldom or never goes below 10 feet. Many small town managers, and also many city managers think they cannot afford to use the necessary current to make a brilliant picture. In my opinion in nine cases out of ten they are saving at the spigot and wasting at the bung-hole; in other words, saving in the operating room at the expense of the box office. Quite true the amount possible of patronage in the small town is not very large, but I am very thoroughly of the opinion that even in the small town the projection of a brilliant picture will bring sufficient added patronage, or patronage at a sufficiently higher price to far more than pay the cost of the extra current necessary to project a fairly brilliant picture. Often and often I have gone into a small town theater, and into a city theater, too, for that matter, found the house half filled and the manager busily engaged in complaining of poor business. One glance at the screen was enough. No wonder that man had poor business. Often I have asked him: "Heavens, man! why don't you use more current and put on a decent picture?" only to have him reply: "Why, Mr. Richardson, I can barely pay expenses as it is. I would run behind if I used more current."

And there you are. The man absolutely could not understand the proposition that people were not enthusiastic about coming to see a show that was only half a show to start with. Taking 110 volts through a rheostat, 7 hours a day, 6 days a week, at $35, or a month with current at 10c. per k.w. hour, would mean 20 amperes at the arc.

That Depends.

A. A. Ashley, Crosby, North Dakota, renews his subscription, orders a Handbook, and says:

> I think the M. P. World is the best thing of its kind, and trust the Handbook is equally good. Regarding theater ventilation, does the foul air stay near the floor or does it rise? Could I better ventilate a small theatre through a ventilating shaft extending from the floor to a distance of six feet above the roof, or would an opening in the ceiling be better? In both cases a fan can be installed. Would like to suggest a question for discussion, viz., how does a rotary converter work? Have never found anything fully covering the working of such devices.

I do not profess to be an expert in ventilation, however, broadly speaking, I should say that pumping fresh air in through ducts in the floor and sucking it out through the ceiling is the best possible condition. This by reason of the fact that fresh air coming in through the floor receives heat both from the audience, and, in winter, from the heating apparatus, and naturally rises, passing out through the ceiling ventilators. As to the converter I doubt if it would be practical to give instruction which would teach you in understandable form the electrical action of a rotary converter. However, I will see what I can dig up along those lines.

Must Stand Examination.

Montgomery, Alabama, attaches a page of newspaper showing the elaborate advertising done by moving picture theaters of that city, and says:

> The only law we have is that all operators must be examined. The examination covers everything contained in the operating room, and some things that are not contained therein. The operator who passes has to be a first-class electrician; also you must understand lenses pretty thoroughly, be able to take the machine down and put it together again, and understand that films must not be run faster than fifteen minutes, or slower than twenty-four minutes to the thousand feet.

I wish every city had a law absolutely prohibiting the running of pictures at more than 65 or 70 feet to the minute, or slower than 55 feet, with a heavy penalty attached for violating the same. It would be for the good of the business and the good of the public.

Auto Power.

C. F. Getter, Seattle, Washington, comes eastward with the following:

> In issue of February 20 I note Mr. Sweeney's (Gordon, Neb.) method of application of auto power to the generator for moving picture purposes, and must offer adverse criticism. I have a fairly wide knowledge of motor car construction and would not care to submit a car of mine to that kind of usage. Of course in the Sweeney plan the rear wheel used for driving does run twice as fast as under ordinary conditions, but heaven help the poor differential gears of the car. The ordinary wear on them, if used as they were intended, is slight, for they come into use only when the car is rounding a corner, and the makers construct them with that fact in view. When it comes to driving a three or four k. w. generator off one wheel; well—I am sure the automobile manufacturer's guarantee would not cover such use, or rather abuse of the differential. Of course it might work all right for a limited time, but it would be analogous to over-loading the generator about 200 per cent., and some day "There'll come a time." I would, therefore, warn Brother Sweeney, and all others, against that plan, unless they want to encounter heaps of trouble.
> And, now, criticism should be constructive as well as destructive, therefore I give you a plan of an auto-picture show set which I constructed, and which gave uninterrupted, non-stop service nightly for six months. First get an auto that has a > gear box as a separate unit, and placed amidship, that is, approximately in the middle of the chassis. A car with the gear box integral with the engine base casting or a "planetary" or friction drive car is not suitable. Any machine shop can reconstruct the chassis, shortening the driving shaft and setting back the gear box sufficiently to place a dynamo between the engine and the gear box. It may be advisable to jack up the front of the engine and tilt the whole power plant, thereby lessening the angle of the driving shaft at the universal joint immediately back of the gear box. This may seem complicated to one not too familiar with auto construction, but to an engineer it is quite simple. Select a slow speed dynamo of required capacity and fit it with a new and longer shaft, couplings, etc., to connect it with the clutch of the engine and the gear box. Place it on rigid brackets, attached to the chassis frame, and be sure to have it in perfect alignment with the engine and gear box. It probably will be necessary to somewhat redesign the clutch, but there will be no great trouble in that direction, and—there you are! Of course the above will cost something more than a couple of dollars, but if a man contemplates going into the traveling show game, using an automobile for power, his chief requisite is a dependable plant, which will be easy to operate and have small upkeep cost. In fitting a car as above it is instantly ready for picture purposes, and at the same time its value as tractor is in no way lessened. I constructed a set like the above in N. S. W., Australia. It was built into the chassis of a 4-cylinder, 12-h.p. Talbot car. That particular car needed very little reconstruction to meet the purpose. The dynamo was an 80-volt, 50-ampere Seimens, compound wound. When the car was used for traction purposes the shaft of the dynamo acted simply as a driving member for the car. The dynamo was protected from road dirt by a canvas cover. When wanted as a juice producer the gears were put in neutral, the resistance cut out of the dynamo field, and instantly the outfit was ready for a show, as far as current was concerned. By utilizing an old solenoid from a street arc lamp I made a very satisfactory electric governor for the engine, so that, even with a varying load, it held the voltage steady. I could cut out the arc and the engine would not race.

I am consuming space on this particular proposition because I hope it will be of considerable value to traveling showmen. The scheme looks good to me. Brother Sweeney's plan certainly is very hard on the differentials, though I think, even so, they would stand up for quite a while. As I understand Brother Getter's plan, when the automobile is running he simply cuts in the field resistance, which, of course, prevents the generator from picking up its load. The plan would be comparatively expensive in first cost, but it looks to me as though it would be very effective.

Information Wanted.

J. S. Krick, of Company A, 28th Infantry, Galveston, Texas, says:

> I don't know you personally but I do feel acquainted through reading the best magazine printed—the M. P. World, therefore I feel at liberty to ask a little information. We have a Powers Six A, projecting a 13-foot picture at 74 feet. We show out in the open air, using a plain sheet for a screen, and project a good picture. A pair of 5-inch lenses came with the machine, but something was wrong with them; we had travel ghost to the right. Several operators from town came out to examine it, and it was proved it was caused by the lenses and not the shutter or intermittent movement, so we got another pair of lenses and they were worse than the others. We took the 5-inch lenses from an Edison machine and now we are getting a fine picture. We use two rheostats connected up in multiple on a.c.; ⅝-inch cored carbons top and botton; condensers are: rear, 7½; front, 6½. Can you tell me how we can improve?

It is results you are after of course, and if you are getting them that is all that is necessary. However, two 7½-inch condensing lenses ought to be better than your present combination. As to that lens matter, why, you are putting up something that seems to be an impossibility. I would suggest that you fooled yourself in one or two ways. First, the probability is that your shutter was set out too far on the shaft, and that when you put on the last lenses you, without noticing it, set the shutter further back towards the lens. Under certain conditions, with too long a condenser combination, exactly the opposite might be true; second, it is possible there was a difference in the focal length of the lenses and the ones you used before, though that, of course, would change the size of your picture, and to work out correctly would make it smaller. More than this I could not say. It is rather a queer proposition the way you put it, nor could I, from the dope at hand, offer further suggestion for improvement.

Definition of a Knocker.

In February 20th issue I published some letters which have aroused the ire of Crockett Brown, manager Unique Theater, Nashwauk, Minnesota. I could not publish the whole letter, because it would not be passed by the board of censors, but Friend Brown's definition of a knocker is too good to be lost. He says in part:

> Am just in receipt of my copy of the World for February 20th, and after reading the projection department (our comic section), I am prompted to say that the picture business as well as every other business or profession has its "knockers." You know, Friend Richardson, that after God made the rattlesnake, the toad and the vampire, he had some awful substance left with which he made a knocker. A knocker is a two-legged animal with a corkscrew soul, a water soaked brain and a combination backbone of jelly and glue. Where other men carry their hearts he has a tumor of decayed principles. When he comes down the street honest men turn their backs, the angels weep tears in Heaven, and the devil locks the gates of hell to keep him out. Let me admonish the readers of the M. P. World, and of the projection department particularly, don't be a knocker. It will never get you anywhere. Why don't these critics tell us small town exhibitors where we can see good projection when we visit the cities? I am very often in St. Paul, and go to Chicago once in a while, and judging from the projection in some of the houses in those cities all that operator reads is the comic section of some newspaper. I have repeatedly gone to cities looking for points that I might be able to improve my screen results, but as a rule I have failed to find anything better than we have right here in this small town of Nashwauk. And now, Brother Richardson, I don't want to stir up that Stillwater argument again, and, moreover, I don't know anything about the show conditions in that city, and don't care anything about it, but the funny part of this controversy is, to me, why don't we hear from the exhibitors of Stillwater instead of St. Paul? Stillwater is a little town of 10,198 population. Now I do not think the people of Stillwater are any different from those of other cities, when it comes to moving pictures. Mr. Anderson says a "reel showman" recently opened the Auditorium and gave away five thousand free tickets every day for two weeks, a total of 70,000 tickets, and gave in addition to three reels three acts of independent vaudeville, and yet they would not come. Rather strange, isn't it? You will note my letter-head reads: "The World's Best Photoplays Uninterrupted by Imitation Vaudeville," and that is just what I give 'em, and I get 10 and 15 cents for a three reel program, often raising that price to 20 cents for a good five or six reel subject. And now, in closing, let me say that when I get the World the first thing I read is the department, every word of it, then I go after the advertising for the exhibitor, and then I read the whole business from cover to cover, advertisements and all, after which I remove the projection and advertising for exhibitors departments by raising the ends of the wire staple which holds the magazine together. I then replace the staples and press them down. I have been doing this for the past four years and I now have four books of the projection department and four of the advertising department, as I put each year into a book, and each book is bound and dated. I have not missed a copy in four years. After the departments have been removed and I have absorbed everything of interest I tie the Worlds up in bundles and lay them aside. In closing, again let me say that if this is too strong, "I hope you will be man enough" to dump it in the waste basket.

Really I am not printing this to get back at anybody; that is an absolute fact. It simply is too good to waste. From the way in which Brother Brown handles the American language I should say he ought to be able to get real money from magazines for stories, if he applied himself to it. That definition of a knocker is a classic of its kind.

Better Than a Letter from Home.

Milton M. Moon, Gainesville, Texas, writes:

> Just finished reading February 20th department, which seems to be full of rocks thrown in your direction by a few of the ungrateful. I would suggest that the best thing for Friend Anderson, the I. C. S. E. E., Class '02, etc., etc., graduate is to go back to the I. C. S. and have the faculty of that distinguished Well of Learning examine his S. I. dome (S. I. is not I. S. backwards. Nay, nay, Pauline. It is merely the initials designed to indicate a condition, which we will leave your readers to dope out for themselves). Possibly somewhere in the foregoing S. I. there are some little magnets that have gone wrong. I have yet to meet the student from any college of electrical or mechanical art who could actually go into an engine room and take the place of a man with practical experience. My view is if you want to learn a trade, become an apprentice, serve your time, thus obtaining the practical experience, and then go to the books for the remainder. You, Brother Richardson, may disagree with me in this, but, even so, every man has the right to his own opinion, and this is mine. I wish to announce to you and the department that I have found a real, good, honest-to-God friend; his name is Joseph H. M. Smith, of Fort Worth, eighty-five miles away. In one of his letters he speaks of you as being one of his best friends. I asked him if he did not think you are every operators' best friend. Personally, I know you are if they want you to be. I would rather get the Moving Picture World each week than a letter from home, mostly on account of the department. I really don't see how I got along without it. We have just opened this new theater, which cost $15,000, and, believe me, it has got a nice little operating room. But I had my troubles with the contractor, who thought the operator was just a nice little statue who could occupy any hole in the wall. The ventilation is just what you suggested in the Handbook; a pipe 2 feet in diameter at the top and 6 feet at the bottom—under it sets the machine. By the influence of Brother Smith, who sent Mr. Crickmore here, we have succeeded in getting together thirteen of the best operators and stage hands into the union. Yes, the managers have already recognized us.

Heavens, man, what did you write such an interesting letter for? Here I have gone and put pretty near the whole thing into the department and I shouldn't ought to have did it, because the department is rammed-jammed full, and many things waiting. Yes, Brother Smith, of Fort Worth, is a live wire. I wish we had many more like him. In fact, there are a number of good men in that city. I heartily agree with you on the apprenticeship proposition, and have always said get the practical experience first, then the book lore gives you the technical and you have the whole dope. I have said this time and time again. My compliments to the Gainesville union. May bad luck follow it all the days of its existence and—never overtake it.

Toronto Answered.

John Griffiths, Ansonia, Connecticut, says:

> It seems to me Toronto's trouble, March 6th issue, is due to his condenser system being out of focus, or, in other words, the distance between the condensers and aperture is not right. When it is correct, the inner white spot will increase in dimensions until it reaches the middle line, and the blue edge will decrease until it also reaches the middle line, and thus the condensers will be in focus when the spot on the shutter is sharp and clear. No matter what objective is used, this condition is necessary to good results. I suggest he try the following and report: With two 6½ condensers and 50 amperes D. C., with ⅛-inch separation between condensers, set the lamphouse so that the distance between the plane of the back condenser (nearest the arc) and the aperture is 14¼ inches. With a 6½ and a 7½ combination, ⅛-inch separation, 50 amperes D. C., make the distance 15⅛ inches. I give two combinations because I think two 6½-inch condensers will require the arc to be too close to the lenses, and if tried without the proper condenser mount the lens may break.

All of which is respectfully referred to the brother in Toronto, with the caution that he make sure the lenses are of the focal length they are supposed to be.

Comments on the Films

General Film Company.

THE SISTER'S SOLACE (Biograph), March 29.—A simple little tale of love transferred from a man's dead sweetheart to her twin sister. Strong heart interest, but no action. Will please the sentimental. Augusta Anderson and Charles Perley are the principals. One reel.

CURIOSITY (Essanay), March 29.—Curiosity, jealousy and supposed lunacy are the principal ingredients of this one-reel comedy. The action is brisk and the fun of the most elemental sort. Ruth Hennessy, Robert Bolder, and Leo White make the film enjoyable.

PATSY MARRIED AND SETTLED, "Patsy Bolivar" Series, No. 14 (Lubin), March 29.—Good fortune has found Patsy at last and filled his cradle to overflowing; he is now the father of a set of twins: ditto, triplets. Other unexpected things happen in this film to Mr. Patrick Bolivar; he becomes a berry farmer and makes his farm pay. The story takes on a serious turn at times, that makes the triplet climax all the more laughable.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 25, 1915 (Selig), March 29.—The German Red Cross in Russian Poland; Canadian troops at Toronto, Can., on their way to the front; "bread line" of children at the Hotel de Gink, New York City; and Barney Oldfield winning auto race at Venice, Cal., are among the "newsy" features of No. 25.

CUTEY BECOMES A LANDLORD (Vitagraph), March 29.—Farce of the quick-moving and highly humorous sort runs all through this one-reel offering. The finish is rather abrupt, but the difficulties that Wally Van encounters while renting his father's house to strangers furnishes a large quantity of merriment.

THE MAN IN MOTLEY (Essanay), March 30.—An unusual story marks this one-reel photoplay. India furnishes the locale, and Harry Dunkinson has been intrusted with the title role; he performs his task with great skill. Ruth Stonehouse and Richard C. Travers give him fine support.

HAM IN THE HAREM (Kalem), March 30.—This one-reel comedy was reviewed by Lynde Denig in the Moving Picture World of March 6, page 1452.

MONKEY BUSINESS (Lubin), March 30.—The two chief actors in this one-reel farce are a monkey and a small colored boy. The antics of the pair are quite amusing, the monkey's adventures in a bathroom contributing the big scene. Joseph Kaufman and Ethel Clayton are in the cast.

THE LEGAL LIGHT (Selig), March 30.—Tom Mix and his associates in this Western one-reel comedy give an illustration of comic devotion to the opposite sex that does more credit to their hearts than their heads. The fun is wholesome, if not overabundant, and the film serves to keep alive one's faith in cowboy chivalry.

A LUCKY LOSER (Edison), March 31.—A bright, lively one-reel comedy, with considerable fresh material in the plot and a surprise finish. Excellently played by Carlton King, Charlotte De Feleice, John Walker, Julian Reed, and others.

THE FABLE OF "THE DEMAND THAT MUST BE SUPPLIED" (Essanay), March 31.—The George Ade idea of the proper cure for an ultra-romantic maiden. One of his well-directed shafts at the young lady who is long on love but short on common sense. Gerda Holmes and Richard C. Travers are the modern Romeo and Juliet.

ASHES OF GOLD (Selig), March 31.—This one-reel drama runs along familiar lines, with a number of well photographed exteriors to add to its worth. The scenes at the foot of the gnarled old tree are especially fine. The acting is equal to all demands.

A FORTUNE HUNTER (Vitagraph), March 31.—This one-reel film might almost be called a pathetic comedy—the hero's struggles to become a scenario writer will awaken bitter-sweet memories in many a spectator. An entertaining photoplay, in which James Morrison plays the leading role with pleasing results.

JUST A LARK (Biograph), April 1.—Isabel Rea, Chas. H. West and Wm. J. Butler contribute largely to the success of this one-reel comedy-drama. The film reveals lively movement, a number of uncommonly beautiful scenes and a background of engaging romance.

A COAT TALE (Essanay), April 1.—A rattling good one-reel farce. Has the diversity of incident and lively movement necessary to this class of photo play. Acting and staging first class.

MOONSHINES (MinA), April 1.—Harry La Pearl is featured in this one-reel comedy. It is only mildly amusing, although the acting and the producing are up to the MinA standard.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL NO. 26, 1915 (Selig), April 1.—Vice President Marshall at San Francisco; Columbia crew rowing on the Hudson; Grace Darling seeing the Exposition; the Burgess Dunne airship for the Czar of Russia; Red Cross nurses starting for Europe, and European war pictures, are a portion of the animated news items.

THE HEART OF JIM BRICE (Vitagraph), April 1.—Maurice Costello, Billy Billings, Thomas R. Mills and Robert Gaillard make this one-reel detective drama very effective. The story has strong heart interest, built around a child; Mary Costello plays the part with skill.

THE SHERIFF'S DILEMMA (Biograph), April 2.—A strong melodramatic climax marks the close of this one-reel photoplay. The incidents are varied, part of them having to do with a minister and the daughter of an outlaw. The film will keep a firm grasp upon an audience. Claire McDonald and Harry Carey deserve pleasant mention.

IN THE BACKGROUND (Lubin), April 2.—A father's love for his son is the cornerstone of this one-reel drama. The story is theatric, but will appeal strongly to many patrons of the photoplay. William B. Parsons, Webster Campbell and Dolly Larkins act with sincerity, and the production reflects credit upon Paul Powell.

WHEN DUMBLEIGH SAW THE JOKE (Vitagraph), April 2.—Sidney Drew's serious attention to his calling of making other people laugh has achieved the usual happy result in this one-reel farce. This plot is lacking in rotundity, but Mr. Drew builds it up and broadens it out until it becomes one continuous chuckle.

DESTINY DECIDES (Biograph), April 3.—Isabel Rea has the leading role in this one-reel domestic drama. The woman assumed by her has made a great mistake in her first marriage, but destiny kindly removes her worthless husband, and places happiness within her grasp. Not out of the ordinary in plot, but the story is well told.

WHEN GRATITUDE IS LOVE (Edison), April 3.—Picturesque winter scenes and life in a logging camp furnish the background for the usual love story. Thomas MacEvoy is excellent as the hero; and Margaret Prussing not only makes an equally good heroine, but does an exciting cross-country ride on horseback. One reel.

INGOMAR OF THE HILLS (Essanay), April 3.—G. M. Anderson impersonates this modern robber chief, who is won over to giving freedom to his girl captive. Margurite Clayton is the present day Parthenia. This one-reel revision of the famous old play averages well with the usual "Broncho Billy" film.

A LIFE IN THE BALANCE (No. 21 of "The Hazards of Helen" Railroad Series) (Kalem), April 3.—This one-reel drama of life on the rail moves on a fast schedule: It is one of the best of the series and contains a spectacular finish that should satisfy even the adventurous soul of Miss Helen Holmes.

MOTHER OF PEARL (Lubin), April 3.—Arthur Johnson and Lottie Briscoe play opposite to each other in this one-reel comedy by Shannon Fife. The theme deals with the mother-in-law question, Eleanor Blanchard appearing as that important character. The acting is all that could be desired, and Mr. Fife has worked considerable new business into the plot.

A NIGHT IN THE JUNGLE (Selig), April 3.—The wild animals used in this one-reel Jungle-Zoo drama are introduced in a perfectly natural manner. The scenes in South Africa are cleverly reproduced, and the story is entertaining in itself.

General Film Company Specials.

KILLED AGAINST ORDERS (Edison), March 29.—The story of a lady "Master Criminal," this three-part melodrama stretches the arm of probability to the very limit. The love interest between the girl thief and the District Attorney who convicts her father has the advantage of novelty, and several of the other incidents also exhibit an original turn of mind on the part of Mary Rider, author of the photoplay. Miriam Nesbitt does full justice to the leading character, and the acting of Bigelow Cooper, Robert Brower and the others is commendable.

POISON (Kalem), March 29.—This two-part drama was reviewed by Lynde Denig in the Moving Picture World of March 20, page 1772.

MA'S GIRLS (Selig), March 29.—There is one incident in this two-reel film that would make it worth while, even if there were nothing else to it: where Tom Mix is lassoed and dragged through a river and along a road by a fast-running horse. This photodrama is excitement from start to finish, the story is a rattling good one, and every one in the cast contributes to its success.

THE AMERICANO (Biograph), March 30.—Its scenes laid on a rancho in Old California, this two-part film-drama starts off at a lively rate, slows down during the greater part of the second reel, and then repeats the rescue of the heroine from pirates as a finish. The picturesque scenes of the period are exceedingly well done. Alan Hale, Franklin Ritchie and Louise Vale carry off the acting honors.

THE ENEMIES (Vitagraph), March 30.—A review of this subject can be found on page 1464 in the issue of March 6.

THE WRITING ON THE WALL (Episode No. 10 of "The Girl Detective" Series) (Kalem), March 31.—In this two-reel drama the task confronting the lady "Pinkerton" is not very complicated, but she tackles it with confidence, and runs down a gang of blackmailers that makes a prisoner of a wealthy old gentleman. Not the most exciting film of the series. Cleo Ridgely, Wm. H. West and Frank Jonasson do their usual good work.

THE UNMARRIED HUSBAND (Lubin), March 31.—The atmosphere of this two-part drama by Shannon Fife is one-third Dickens and the rest Owen Davis. There is incident aplenty in the film; much of it highly dramatic but it carries little conviction. A number of Mr. Fife's expert touches in dealing with life are scattered through it, but he has failed to blend his material with his usual skill. Arthur Matthews and Ethel Clayton lead the acting, and with Percy Winter and Eleanor Dunn round out a capital performance.

A JITNEY ELOPEMENT (Essanay), April 1.—A Charlie Chaplin film that starts with a chuckle and ends with a roar. The funny business leading up to the elopement is excellent preparation for the flight of the couple in their jitney auto. Two reels of genuine "touch-and-go" farce.

THE WHITE MASK (Lubin), April 1.—This subject was reviewed by W. Stephen Bush in the issue of January 23, page 493.

THE BOSTON TEA PARTY (Edison), April 2.—This two-part drama was reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison in the Moving Picture World of March 20, page 1773.

COUNTESS VESCHI'S JEWELS (Essanay), April 2.—Charles Belmont Davis furnishes the scenario of this two-part drama. It is a "crook" play with a surprise finish. The start is a trifle slow, but the story gains speed later, and contains considerable fresh material. Bryant Washburn, Thomas Commerford, Sidney Ainsworth, Helen Dunbar and Nellie Craig are the principals.

THE REIGN OF THE SIREN (Kalem), April 2.—This three-part drama was reviewed by Hanford C. Judson in the Moving Picture World of April 3, page 68.

JANET OF THE CHORUS (Vitagraph), April 3.—The word "smart," in its most complimentary sense, may be applied to everything and everybody connected with this two-reel comedy by William Addison Lathrop. The entire affair is a snappy, deftly drawn and vastly diverting page from the comic history of to-day. Even the sub-titles reflect the same spirit. As Janet, little Miss Norma Talmadge is irresistible; and S. Rankin Drew gives a perfect impersonation of a youthful "rounder." Vandyke Brooke's, acting as the wealthy uncle, and his production of the film, are both greatly to his credit.

Mutual Film Corporation.

THE ARTIST'S WIFE (Majestic), April 2.—An artistically produced picture, with Miriam Cooper, Elmer Clifton, Lucille Younge, and some others whose names we do not know, but who deserve special mention, appearing in it. The story follows the lines of melodrama, and treats of the home life of a couple of artists, and the model who frequents the studio, and who loves one of the artists. The entrance on the scene of a banker's daughter brings about the climax of the story, where the model is accidentally shot by a lover of the other woman. The picture gives a story within a story, and its close shows the artist caring lovingly for the crippled woman, now his wife.

SYMPATHY SAL (Reliance), April 3.—The young woman who plays the role of Sal in this two-reel production is very charming in the part. The story of the pictude is not out of the ordinary, but on the whole the production pleases. Sal was a "hash slinger" in a western town, according to some people; but the father of the easterner who fell in love with her is afterwards forced to admit that she is good enough for his son.

ETHEL'S DEADLY ALARM CLOCK (No. 20 of the "Bill" Series) (Komic), April 4.—This constitutes No. 20 of the "Office Boy" series. Elmer Booth appears along with the usual cast, and does effective work. A novelty is introduced at the end where the Dago is blown up by his own deadly contrivance, and ascends into the clouds, descending at the door of his own home only to receive the hard end of a broom stick across his back.

THE WINNING HAND (Reliance), April 5.—This domestic story gets an interesting start, but the close is not as satisfying as it might have been, perhaps because it does not seem convincing. The widow's daughter rebels against the man her mother proposes to marry; later the man turns out to be a thief and the child holds him up with a revolver.

THE ONCE OVER (Beauty), April 6.—Rather an ordinary picture with a slight situation. A couple of young men start out after the same girl and the one of them that elopes with her finds to his sorrow that she has been married before and is the mother of four or five children which he is now in a fair way to have to support.

A TOUCH OF LOVE (American), April 7.—Charlotte Burton, Harry Von Meter and Vivian Rich appear to good advantage in this picture. The story takes the form of mild melodrama, and is interesting and fairly realistic. It is a tale of the western dance halls, and has been handled very well with the exception of some vision scenes that have been placed rather indiscriminately.

THE INDIAN CHANGELING (Reliance), April 7.—This is a good story, but deserved longer development. The scenes are so short that they appear as a succession of finishes and hence do not arouse much feeling. The plot is interesting in spite of this and has to do with the changing of an Indian baby for a white child that died. The photography and settings are good.

THE PROBLEM (American), April 9.—An appealing offering, with a nice theme. Edward Coxen and Winifred Greenwood play the lovers. The girl's mother wants her to marry a rich man, but after her unpleasant dream changes her mind. This is exquisitely pictured and holds the attention closely.

A DOUBLE EXPOSURE (Thanhouser), April 11.—A society comedy in which the girl, portrayed by Peggy Burke, disguises as her mother and goes to a party. The deception leads to some amusing situations, all of which are pleasingly handled. Arthur Ashley is the hero. A novel comedy.

Mutual Film Corporation Specials

IN THE CLUTCH OF THE HARBOR THIEVES (Serial Publication Corp. Reliance), March 24.—Installment XI of the "Runaway June" series. Followers of this serial will be glad June was lured to Bermuda by the villain. Some exquisite settings are pictured. The story also exerts a new grip on the observer. The events of this number are exciting and full of interest, the numerous incidents being pictured in an enjoyable way. June escapes from the yacht into a small boat; is taken care of by Giovanni, who helps her elude the pursuing Blye. Later she falls into the hands of the harbor thieves. Ned arrives, having escaped the confinement imposed by Blye, but the latter also appears and the instalment closes with Blye in control of the situation. A good installment.

DR. JIM (Majestic), April 4.—A brisk two-reel Western story with Fred Buns, Catherine Henry and Vesta Perry in the cast. The young doctor befriends Dave, brother of the sheriff's daughter, with whom he is in love. The friendship leads to some stirring adventures and almost costs the doctor his life. This is a typical Western number, handled more strongly than usual and with a rather fresh plot; even the horseback riding is more dashing than common.

HIS BROTHER'S DEBT (American), April 5.—A two-reel production with Winnifred Greenwood, Ed. Coxen and others. The story treats of a circumstance where at the accidental death of his brother who was about to secretly marry a young woman of the neighborhood, the young man marries her himself to save her reputation. Later his wife bridges a situation, and saves him from financial failure, and apparently from this incident comes the dawn of love.

THE RICHEST WOMAN IN THE WORLD (Thanhouser Syndicate Corp.), April 5.—Instalment No. 20 of "The $20,000,000 Mystery." A characteristic number in which the will is finally discovered in Madame Du Val's apartments and Zudora comes into her inheritance. She also gains the love of John Storm, which makes her the richest woman in the world. The settings in this are very much as in former numbers, most of the scenes being taken in Madame Du Val's apartments.

DROPPINGTON'S FAMILY TREE (Keystone), April 12.—Two-reel Keystone with Chester Conklin in the lead. A good many of the scenes of the picture take place in a cabaret where Droppington and his son fall in love with the same girl, one of the dancers. A good deal of slapstick comedy occurs, some of which is very amusing, and some of which would be better eliminated. The production on the whole is entertaining.

THE MOMENT OF SACRIFICE (Thanhouser), April 13.—A two-reel story of an army post, containing some surprising and interesting situations. Lieut. Darrel is suddenly shocked to learn that he is not the colonel's son, but son of the spy just discovered at the post. He goes to the spy's headquarters to regain the stolen plans. He succeeds in destroying these and his life is in danger when the father sacrifices his own life to aid his escape. The situations in this are strong in interest and hold the attention well. It makes on the whole a very pleasing offering, with the scenes at an actual military post.

SHORTY TURNS ACTOR (Broncho), April 14.—A two-reel number featuring Jack Hamilton in his familiar character of Shorty. He takes a correspondence course in acting and goes to a distant town to appear as a Roman gladiator. The burlesque is tremendously pleasing. While the play is on the rascally managers steal the money in the general store and hide it in Shorty's suitcase. When Shorty and his actor friends are run out of the theater, accompanied by a shower of bad eggs, he takes the suitcase with him. He discovers the money on his way home and exhibits it to his cowboy friends as his earnings. This is full of ginger and laughable throughout.

THE SONS OF TOIL (Domino) April 15.—A two-reel labor story with the scenes laid at a coal mine. Denton, the young foreman, is in love with a girl named Delia, and has a jealous rival named Ford. The men want to strike and Denton refuses to join them. Ford spreads false information concerning him. The strike scenes later are well presented and there is plenty of action. A company of militia is called out to quell the disturbances and some battle scenes are shown. This is well constructed and a good offering of its type.

THE TAKING OF LUKE McVANE (Kaybee), April 16.—A strong Western number in two reels, featuring Wm. S. Hart and Enid Markey. Hart plays the part of Luke. He shoots a man whom he discovers cheating at cards. The sheriff follows and both men are attacked by a band of Indians on the rampage. The escape to the desert and the girl's ruse in throwing the main body of pursuers off the trail made a very absorbing feature. Luke wounds the sheriff and then both are killed while fighting the redskins on the open desert. A picturesque and generally pleasing object, worked out with feeling.

THE CUP OF LIFE (New York Motion Picture Co.), April.—A five-reel feature, picturing again the old, old story of the right and wrong road for a woman to take. In this case the plot follows the lives of two shop girls. Ruth marries, but Helen chooses the paths of pleasure. The story deals chiefly with the latter's adventures, showing how she went from one man to another until she finally lost her charm and became hopelessly degraded. Bessie Barriscale does some excellent work in this role, and her makeups, showing the ravages of the passing years of sin, were very good. The production is strong throughout, with good settings, fine photography and a nicely balanced cast.

Paramount Program.

A HYDRO-AEROPLANE FLIGHT AT PALM BEACH (April 12).—The first release in the Paramount Travel Series of one-reel films, being photographed by a squad of cameramen bound for South America. Reviewed on page 245 of The Moving Picture World of April 10.

The Pathe Exchange Inc.

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 24, 1915 (March 22-27).—One of the most interesting items of this issue brings us to the vicinity of Prezemysl during the recent siege showing the men in the trenches and the intermittent artillery fire. Other scenes of interest show Lloyd-George reviewing a regiment of Welshmen; France's future army; boy scouts aiding Kitchener's army by building tents; and a cartoon, "Teasing the Eagle," by Flhori.

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 25, 1915 (March 22-27).—Among the interesting items of No. 25 are: Recruits off to guard our island possessions (Philippines); the funeral of Lincoln Beachey, aviator; Austrian soldiers watering their horses at the primitive wells of the country; Glacier Park Indians at San Francisco, showing Chief Many Tail Feathers, 104 years old, taking an aeroplane flight with aviator Christofferson.

United Film Service.

AFFINITIES (United-Grandin), March 24.—In this two-reel production the United Film Service has released one of the best comedies that has been on the market in some time. It is listed as a comedy-drama but is so imbued with the comic element that one hesitates to apply the latter term to its makeup. An extensive review on this production will be found on page 1620 of the issue of March 13, 1915.

Universal Film Mfg. Co.

ANIMATED WEEKLY, NO. 160 (Universal), March 31.—Bavarian and Canadian troop reviews, an ovation to the Czar in Petrograd, Orange day in California and other scenes of general interest are included in this number.

LIFE'S FURROW (Laemmle), April 11.—A pretty story of a farm boy who goes to college, leads a wild life, but returns unexpectedly and takes up the plow again. Mrs. Benson, Millard K. Wilson and Helen Leslie have the leading parts. This is attractive scenically and makes a nice appeal throughout.

THE STREETS OF MAKE BELIEVE (Imp), April 12.—A clever, well acted little comedy, with King Baggot and Jane Gail in the leads. As a clerk and laundress respectively they pretend to be society people, but recognize each other later under very amusing circumstances. This is fresh and pleasing in treatment.

SKIPPER SIMPSON'S DAUGHTER (Joker), April 12.—Rivalry over the daughter of an old salt is the motive of this low comedy number. Two suitors quarrel over her and then Artemus Boggs turns up and captivates her. The plot flounders rather aimlessly in places, but there are a few amusing moments in this.

THE OLD TUTOR (Big U), April 13.—Murdock MacQuarrie appears in this as private instructor to some rich children. When poverty overtakes them he goes out and works for them with pick and shovel. Later the girl's lover buys a book store and puts the tutor in charge of it. A pleasant, appealing story, with good cast and photgraphy.

A MIXED UP ELOPEMENT (Nestor), April 13.—Jack Dillon, Neal Burns, Billie Rhodes and Harry Rattenberry appear in this short number. The detective watches the wrong girl and the father has his long chase for nothing. This is light and quite pleasing, though the plot is not overly strong. An educational subject will be released with the above.

A MAN AND HIS MONEY (Rex), April 15.—A pretty story with a somewhat disappointing ending, with Pauline Bush and Ray Gallegher in the leads. He plays the part of a spendthrift millionaire. She is shocked by his extravagances. Later the girl loses her fortune and her lover traces her by a burned ten dollar bill. This is attractively pictured and might have had a stronger close.

PLAYMATES (Sterling), April 15.—This very amusing juvenile offering will take the average observer back to his childhood days with a vengeance. The manner in which the kids fall into a muddy pond and try to clean up in the bathtub afterward is very funny. A fine juvenile subject.

ALL IN THE SAME BOAT (Nestor), April 16.—Stella Adams appears in this comedy number as Miss Dillpickle. She advertises for a husband in name only, whom she agrees to pay a hundred dollars a week and take on a trip to Europe. Jack accepts the offer; his girl and her father take the same boat, which leads to complications. This is not very strong but contains numerous amusing moments.

THE WAY HE WON THE WIDOW (Joker), April 17.—A low comedy which is considerably better than the average, with Max Asher, Gale Henry, Milburn Moranti and Wm. Franey in the cast. Max makes a man out of the widow's invalid son, teaching him to defend himself against the teasing boys. This strikes the observer as new and pleasing.

THE LOVE THAT LASTS (Powers), April 17.—Sydney Ayres, Doris Pawn and Val Paul appear in this number. The girl is attracted by the idler and marries him; later her child dies and the husband is killed. Her former lover also marries; his wife dies, but the child lives. A wise doctor brings the survivors of fate together in one family. This has a good touch of pathos in it and makes quite a strong appeal. It is also very well photographed.

Universal Film Mfg. Co., Specials.

ON THE RACK (Universal Special), April 5.—Episode No. 5 of "The Black Box" series. This is one of the most coherent and enjoyable numbers shown since the first instalment. It begins with Quest under suspicion for the murder of his secretary and the Salvation Army girl. He is thrown into prison. One of his women assistants, impersonated by Lauro Oakley, exchanges clothes with him. Quest then works in connection with Lenora to clear up the mystery. The latter is made a captive while at the professor's home and the problem deepens as the reel closes. A very interesting instalment.

THE GRIND (Rex), April 11.—A strong three-reel offering, written by Ida May Park. It tells the story of three sisters left alone in life. The eldest, Jane, is portrayed by Pauline Bush; Lillie is a ribbon counter girl and Rita a stenographer. Jean is an actress and looks out for the younger sisters. The crisis comes when Rita almost falls into the clutches of her designing employer and is saved by Jean. This has all been done before, but in this particular story it is worked out very naturally and many of the situations are strong. It is all interesting and the sordid moments are not drawn out too long. Jean's love story turns out well and the close is very effective.

THE UNSEEN TERROR (Universal Special Release), April 12.—Instalment No. 6 of "The Black Box" series. Continuing Quest's search for the Gallaghers, whom he finally rounds up after exciting work. Herbert Rawlinson, in the part of Quest, does some interesting gymnastic work in escaping from the fire along a rope. His disguises are a frank reminder of Nick Carter methods; which does not make them in any way less interesting. Lenora is also rescued from her strange captivity in this number. The number is a characteristic one and full of action from start to finish, almost to the point of confusing the observer.

SAVED BY A DREAM (Victor), April 12.—A two-reel number, featuring Harry C. Myers and Rosemary Theby. The son of the rich man falls into the hands of an adventuress. She lures him on and he neglects his own sweetheart for her. In his dream he sees himself robbing his father's safe and then choking the latter to death. Later he rushes to the apartment of the adventuress, where he also chokes her until she agrees to shield him. This is, of course, all a dream, but is enacted with unpleasant realism. The picture is very well constructed but should have been toned down somewhat in these scenes for the average audience. The close is a happy one.

A WILD IRISH ROSE (Gold Seal), April 13.—An Irish love story in two reels, featuring Cleo Madison, Joe King and others. This has a number of pleasing scenic features and tells a story somewhat different from the usual Irish type. The settings and atmosphere are accurate and numerous incidents of a natural, attractive sort are strung along through the yarn. The plot is one in which the girl is turned from her true lover by false representation, but he returns in time to prevent her marriage with another. A pleasing offering.

UNDER THE TABLE (L-KO), April 14.—A two-reel low comedy number, featuring Hank Mann, Gertrude Selby and Reggie Morris. The prudish young wife is shocked by her husband's pictures and statues. Later she gets up a flirtation. Her parents also become entangled in affairs and several couples wind up in the same restaurant, where a rough house ensues—a very rough house. There is no absolute vulgarity in this; the photography is good and there is considerable amusement of the knockabout type in it. A very fair example of the slapstick comedy.

THE TROUBADOUR (Big U), April 15.—A two-reel number featuring Murdock MacQuarrie as a Spanish minstrel. He lures the girl, impersonated by Agnes Vernon, from a convent, intending to marry her. He is beaten by thugs and she falls into the hands of Shannon, a bully, who forces her to wed him. Later the troubadour saves the wife and child from the drunken husband. After the latter's death they marry. There are some rather pleasing scenes in this, though the photography is dark in places. The plot itself is only fairly strong. It strikes on the whole a very fair average.

THE BOMBAY BUDDHA (Imp), April 16.—A three-reel idol story, written by John B. Clymer and produced by Stuart Paton. The idol is seen being taken from the Powers family safe, by some unknown. Detectives are employed to recover it and a number of Hindoos are brought into play. Though the plot ingredients in this are very familiar there is still a pleasing novelty in the development of this story. The detective's ruse for locating the idol was a good one. The photography is good and the story as a whole retains the interest well.

THE DOORWAY OF DESTRUCTION (Bison), April 17.—A fine two-reel story of the Indian mutiny, with Francis Ford, Mina Cunard and others in the cast. Ford plays the captain of an Irish regiment, in love with his colonel's daughter. He is not in good standing with the colonel and when the rebellion comes on the Irish regiment is ordered to batter down an almost impregnable gateway. Again and again they are repulsed, but when the Irish flag is displayed victory is achieved. The battle scenes in this are splendidly put on, and there is a pleasing touch of romance in the story. The offering is an unusually good one of the kind.

THE MAN WHO FOUND HIMSELF, April 5.—A five-part adaptation of George Broadhurst's drama, "The Mills of the Gods," with Robert Warwick in the leading role. A review of this picture appeared in The Moving Picture World of April 10, on page 242.

Miscellaneous.

THE VOW (Broadway Film), April.—Marion Leonard is the featured player in this four-part drama, reviewed on page 243 of The Moving Picture World of April 10.

VITAGRAPH EDUCATIONAL SUBJECT.

An educational picture in three parts, "The Lady of the Lighthouse," has just been completed by the Vitagraph Company, produced under the direction of Capt. Harry Lambart. "The Lady of the Lighthouse" was picturized from the book of the same name by Helen S. Woodruff and taken in co-operation with the New York Association for the Blind. It is the first time pictures have been taken in the rooms of the Association, this being made possible by the new light adopted by the Vitagraph Company. Of particular interest are many "close-ups" showing the blind at work and the marvelous dexterity with which they employ their fingers in the making of gold lace, baskets, in the caning of chairs and the many other vocations at which they become adepts. While of an educational nature there is enough dramatic appeal in "The Lady of the Lighthouse" to make it one of the most attractive of film dramas. Lionel Adams, who made his initial appearance as a Vitagraph Player in this picture, is seen to excellent advantage, his co-players being Rose Tapley and Charles Wellesley.

"The Snow Burner"

A Photoplay in Three Parts by Essanay, Adapted by Henry Oyen from the Adventure Magazine, with Richard C. Travers and E. H. Calvert in Strong Roles.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

A RED-BLOODED story of life in a logging camp, in the north country wilds, with an atmosphere that fairly tingles with the hard lot of rough men under the grinding rule of a still rougher master, is told in three reels of film, in gripping fashion, by Essanay, under the direction of E. H. Calvert, who also impersonates the titular character.

The strength of the photodramatization centers in the characters assumed by Richard C. Travers and Mr. Calvert—

Scene from "The Snow Burner" (Essanay).

"Toppy" Treplin and "Hell Camp" Rievers—great dominant human forces, impelled and actuated by spirits of entirely opposite nature. It was, indeed, happy that these characters were placed in the care of such capable and strenuous men. There was no place here for the physical weakling, no matter what his mentality. The occasion called for a rare combination of brawn, brain and physical courage, and Messrs. Calvert and Travers have risen to it with such marked snap and realism that the spectator, at times, will be carried to such a pitch of interest and enthusiasm that he will be tempted to voice his approval in ringing hurrahs.

The great test of courage, science and endurance of "Toppy" and Rievers is shown in the great logging shed, where the massive entrance doors are guarded by armed guards, and where the witnesses of the fray are the cowed, husky loggers, who have felt more than once the brutal force of the "Hell Camp" boss. There is nothing brutalizing about this meeting between the two men; nothing whatever, so far as I was impressed by the scene. There was rather a spirit of exultation over the fact that the clean-minded man and the friend of the down-trodden succeeds in overmastering physically the big bully of men and browbeater and wronger of women.

I have nothing but praise for the virile impersonation of "Hell Camp" Rievers by Mr. Calvert. There must be no lily-fingered portrayal of this strong character, and Mr. Calvert knew it. In contrast, the part of "Toppy" Treplin by Mr. Travers is made all the stronger. Gentleman and respecter and protector of women as "Toppy" is, his taming of the dreaded boss is made all the more a great and crowning victory. I believe every one who views these pictures will agree with me that Mr. Travers as "Toppy" makes one of the biggest hits in his photoplay career.

Miss Lillian Drew, as Helen Pearson, the lady in the case, is pleasing; and Tilly, the squaw, is capably drawn by Miss Camille D'Arcy. "Old Scotty," the blacksmith, is competently presented by Ernest Maupsin.

Helen Pearson, whose father is dying, and who may be saved if a certain sum of money is forthcoming to meet the cost of a difficult surgical operation, accepts the position of bookkeeper from "Hell Camp" Rievers, whom once before she had refused as a husband. She had accepted the position, however, without knowing that Rievers was to be her employer. Rievers is unscrupulous in his dealings with women and had thus planned to get even on the old score.

"Toppy" Treplin, a young man of means, who spends much of his time in hunting, chances to meet Helen on her way to "Hell Camp" and resolves to follow her. He finds out the character of the man who is about to become her employer, and hires out as blacksmith's assistant in "Hell Camp," so as to be near the young woman who has awakened such a tender interest in his heart.

"Toppy" learns from "Tilly," a half-breed squaw whom Rievers seeks to get rid of when Helen arrives, that the "boss" is planning the ruin of that young woman. He also learns for himself the abject serfdom to which the "boss" has reduced all the workers in "Hell Camp." The differences between the "boss" and himself culminate in a terrific physical conflict, which results in the defeat of the "Hell Camp" boss. The night of the same day on which "Toppy" scored his great victory, the "boss" attempts to force his way into Helen's quarters; but "Toppy" is on the scene before this is accomplished. Rievers seizes "Toppy's" throat in a death grip and is fast choking him, when Helen throws open the door, near which the men are struggling, and shoots Rievers in the arm. The coward flees to a cave in the quarry nearby, and is pursued by the whole force of "Hell Camp," the members having overpowered their guards. There he holds them at bay until one of the leaders hurls a stick of dynamite into the cave, and "Hell Camp" Rievers, the Snow-Burner, is shattered to atoms.

"Toppy" buys the camp, and asks Helen to be his wife and to retain her position as bookkeeper. The release date is April 20.

"The Face of the Madonna"

Alice Joyce Has Very Pretty Part in Picture of Sentiment That Pleases and Entertains (Kalem—Three Parts).

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THESE three-reel Kalems are proving to be worthy offerings. This one, "The Face of the Madonna," tells a story of sentiment not quite so strong as the preceding one, "The Third Commandment," but I believe that, as a popular offering, it will run ahead of it. The story is new only in its development, which is fuller and more careful than that of most, so far as we remember, of all its predecessors. It was produced by Keanan Buel and has a very pretty part for Alice Joyce, which she fills in many of its scenes with much charm.

Scene from "The Face of the Madonna" (Kalem).

The central theme is the converting power exercised on both the artist, a rather loose man, and on his model, a girl burglar, of the picture of the Madonna and Child that he paints. The girl would never have consented to pose had he not discovered on her arm a bracelet she had stolen from his wife, who, it chances, had left him as impossible to live with. He threatens to turn this girl burglar over to the police and so compels her to pose. These conversions are only convincing through sentimentality. Not even here is the change of heart, particularly on the part of the artist, made strongly plausible; but one feels that such things might be and they do not offend—they are not against our humanity, but in favor of it, so the spectator is not so particular or critical.

The picture, as we have intimated, has much commendable acting and many beautiful scenes. Guy Coombs plays the artist; Helen Lindroth, his irritable wife; Robert D. Walker, the gangster whom the girl (Alice Joyce) marries just before he is killed by a member of a rival gang. She becomes a burglar under the tuition of her husband's father (James B. Ross) and refuses to go back to her own father, played by Henry Hallem. The principal backgrounds are city slums, the artist's home and an orphanage.

"Twilight Sleep" on the Screen

The Administering of Scopolamin and Its Effects Are Shown in Remarkable Film Prepared by Dr. Schlossingk.

DR. KURT E. SCHLOSSINGK, an associate of Professors Kronig and Gauss, of the Frauenklinik, Greiburg, Germany, where "twilight sleep" was discovered, has prepared a remarkably interesting picture showing every phase of the much-discussed treatment. The first public exhibition was at the West End theater, New York, beginning Monday, April 5. Preceding the showing of the picture, in two short reels, Dr. Schlossingk gave a brief lecture and after the film had been run he answered questions offered by the audience.

The scenes were photographed in a Brooklyn hospital under the auspices of the Motherhood Educational Society and give for the first time a scientificially accurate and comprehensive depiction of the administering of the hypnotic drug, scopolamin; its action during all of the stages through which a patient must pass and the resulting benefits. Dr. Schlossingk is shown at the bedside of a woman, superintending the treatment that begins with blood tests followed by an injection of scopolamin. When an hour has elapsed the memory of the patient is tried by simple means, the idea being to learn whether the drug has been sufficient to produce the "twilight state." If her memory is still active more scopolamin is administered. Blue glasses are placed on her eyes to increase the twilight effect and in the fourth or fifth stage of the treatment a bandage is sometimes substituted for the glasses.

Alternating with scenes, many of them close-ups, showing how the "twilight" mother lapses into a condition of semi-consciousness, feeling neither pain, nor apprehension, are pictures of the natural mother experiencing the torments that have been the heritage of women since time immemorial. One little incident gives a very human touch to the comparison. The two patients are in the same hospital when the silence is broken by a hurdy-gurdy on the street below. The woman under the influence of scopolamin continues to rest quietly, a contented smile on her lips, whereas her neighbor in the adjoining room is awakened to new agonies. No spectator will question the authenticity of these scenes, very well photographed and judiciously arranged to drive home the arguments in favor of "twilight sleep."

The woman under the care of Dr. Schlossingk is not conscious of having given birth to a child until the effects of the scopolamin have passed off and the nurse places the infant on the pillow beside her. Another significant part of the film has to do with the rapidity of the recovery of the "twilight" mother as compared with the slow improvement in the condition of her neighbor. The pictures of babies born under the new method are proof enough that they are in no way harmed by the semi-consciousness of the mothers. To end the film with a laugh, there is an amusing close-up of a bright little negro infant whose mother was among Dr. Schlossingk's patients.

Technically, the subject is admirably presented and in every way calculated to make more impressive the facts that the German physician includes in his lecture. Dr. Schlossingk has been in this country since last June and in addition to lecturing before medical societies in large cities, has directed clinics at many of the leading hospitals in New York.

Manager Drum Active in Nation's Capital.

Ben E. Drum, Washington manager, of the World Film Corporation is working hand in hand with the Maryland State Branch No. 36 of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America in an endeavor to bring about better co-operative arrangements between the exchange men and the exhibitors, in that territory. He recently attended a big meeting and banquet given by the League and presided over by Marion S. Pearce, National President, where he was given the honor of a place on a committee of three exchange men and three exhibitors to formulate better arrangements. It seems that the entire committee is in favor of organizing a separate body which will ultimately result in an associated exhibitors' and exchange men's league. Another plan was to secure permanent quarters for the private projection of features which could also be made the headquarters for the exhibitors' league.

"His Convert"

An Edison One-Reel of Sudden Change in Characters Wrought by a Clubman's Lark.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

A GENTLE cynic and talented man of the world, portrayed by Marc MacDermott, is enjoying himself with a trio of boon companions in what has the appearance of being a club room, though this impression is dispelled by the entrance of a Salvation lass on a begging tour—an occurence practically impossible. Marc contributes nothing to the cause and is reproached by his friends on the ground that the earnest workers who hold outdoor religious meetings do a great deal of good. The gentle cynic scoffs at the idea, saying that he could accomplish as much without half trying, without even sincerity—it is all a pretense. This leads to a wager, and Marc agrees to preach on the street corners for three nights in succession in proof of his assertion.

This is rather a novel proposition, and the story which follows is treated with a realism that makes it a difficult subject to handle. Mabel Trunelle impersonates a loose character in a manner so accurate that one can scarcely realize that she is the lady of light morals. She is staggeringly consistent in a role that is out of common for her, and her performance gives added force to the dual conversion. The story involves a double change in spirit, purpose and direction of life, for while the skeptical exhorter is engaged holding meetings in the open air for prayer and redemption animating his hearers by rare eloquence to follow better lives, he changes the course of her wayward career and deeply affects his own. He not only incites in her a desire for reformation, but circumstances growing out of her transformation bring him into active relations with her almost-hopeless situation.

The exhorter, lacking in sincerity and in any sense of solemn obligation to his Maker, is still a man of fine sensibilities, merely disgusted by cant and hypocrisy, hence he becomes interested in dead earnest before the time limit for his exhortations has expired. It is pity for a helpless human creature, not love for her, that actuates him in making her redemption complete. He bends the tremendous natural energies at his disposal to placing the girl beyond further persecution, where she can express the best that is in her. He affords her opportunity by enlisting her services as a co-worker at his meetings.

There is nothing unnatural about the story. It is quite possible—it may even have occurred, and, except for the admittance of a woman soliciting organization aid in a gentleman's club, the treatment is in close accord with the facts of daily existence. This is of minor importance to the humanizing theme. The idea that two-sided human nature is often driven by force of circumstances to its worst self-expression is not only common, but it is one which will usually engage sympathy. The most virtuous are secretly conscious of frailty. Through unexpected interest roused in his efforts to do good, the kindhearted cynic becomes an active agent in aiding the weak and erring, where, before, he was merely an ornamental member of society.

Coming Biographs

"Adam Bede," "The Quicksands of Society," "The Children's House," and "When Hearts are Young."

Reviewed by Lynde Denig.

ONCE again the Biograph Company turns to the English classics for a subject. This time it is George Eliot's "Adam Bede," done into an appealing two-part drama of exceptional artistic merit. The completeness with which the director has expressed the spirit of the novel is the more surprising in view of the limits imposed by two reels, not much space in which to present a story of imposing proportions, and "Adam Bede" certainly is that.

Where omissions were necessary, however, they were effected smoothly, so that one never receives the impression of a tale only half told and characters drawn in fragmentary outline. The very fine production, suggestive of old England, save in a few unimportant instances, has much to do with the satisfying results. And of equal value is the acting of Louise Vale as the unhappy Hetty Sorrel, with Franklin Ritchie giving a sincere performance as Adam Bede. Miss Vale is particularly successful in interpreting the emotions experienced by Hetty. Her portrayal is thoroughly well balanced, alive with feeling and certain to excite sympathy for George Eliot's heroine. Alan Hale makes a suitable Arthur Donnithorne, Edward Cecil gives a forceful characterization of Martin, Hetty's uncle, and Gretchen Hartman plays Dinah Morris.

"The Quicksands of Society."

Much the same cast is used in "The Quicksands of Society," another two-part drama made by the Biograph Company in California. Mr. Richie is the husband, Miss Vale the wife, Mr. Hale plays their grown son and Miss Hartman is the designing, selfish woman who typifies "the quicksands of society." She, of course, is the means of separating husband and wife, who are re-united only after years of unhappiness and an automobile fatality that makes possible their re-marriage, for the husband had divorced his first wife and wedded the adventuress. In the auto smash-up the two blessme woman is killed.

Scene from "The Children's House" (Biograph).

The human interest in this story, told with no small skill, is strong, and the characters are given some individuality; more, in fact, than one might expect in situations of such a familiar quality. In point of staging and photography, the film is not open to adverse criticism. Altogether "The Quicksands of Society" is a modern drama well above the average in the treatment given a popular theme.

"The Children's House."

Many newspapers and magazines have carried lengthy articles describing Dr. Montessori's method of training children, which brings, according to all reports ,astonishing results in youthful development. The object of this illuminating one-reel film is to present in picture form Dr. Montessori's youthful charges as they pass the day in one of his homes. A sort of doll's house, with everything on an appropriately miniature scale, was built in the Biograph studio and children of all ages and nationalities were photographed while playing, or working, the two are virtually the same in Dr Montessori's scheme. The youngsters are taught without the tedium of teaching and the audience is treated to such surprising spectacles as three-year-old girls deftly washing and drying pots and pans. The little tots are not posed for the camera; they merely move about naturally, delightfully free from self-consciousness and accustomed to doing things that ordinarily would be considered difficult by children several years older. It is unnecessary to comment on the educational value of a picture of this description and the interest it will arouse, especially among mothers.

"When Hearts Are Young."

A pretty light comedy love story in accord with the Biograph's present policy favoring something more refined than slap-stick burlesque. We have an Indian Summer love affair between a widower and a widow, the Springtime romance of their children and just enough plot to unite the two. The picture is pleasingly presented and if for no other reason would be welcome in that it brings Rea Martin back to the Biograph Company. Of late Miss Martin has been on tour with a "Peg O' My Heart" company. Others in the cast are Jack Drumier, Kate Bruce, Gus Pixley, Adila Comer, Irma Dawkins and Jack Mulhall. "When Hearts are Young" will be released April 23rd; "The Quicksands of Society" is scheduled for the 20th; "The Children's House" for the 26th, and "Adam Bede" for the 27th.

Two Studies in Life

"His Phantom Sweetheart," One Reel, and "Between the Two of Them," Three Reels, of the Vitagraph Portrayals.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

FIRST in favor with the audience is the one-reel "Phantom Sweetheart" of Earle Williams—he is both author and principal in the cast. He and Anita Stewart are heavy contributors to its popularity as capable and attractive interpreters, but it must not be overlooked that Ralph Ince has lavished a wealth of artistry on this little play. Then the story is in accord with the dream of many a romantic bachelor. He sees a beautiful woman all alone in the box opposite his own at the theater and becomes fascinated. That is as far as most of us ever get. She looks at him without recognition, but she notices that he is under the spell of her lovliness, and her lips tremble with a faint smile of delighted vanity. He sighs heavily. Nothing separates them but a tiresome old convention neither is bound to regard—why not fan this flame of mutual attraction into something warmer?

Why not? The lady's faint smile gathers significance, while her dark eyes send a wireless that is not to be mistaken. "Meet me in the lobby" she delicately indicates. He does so, much to the amazement of his friends. He accompanies her to her car; he escorts her home, and he there burns his ships behind him—he dismisses the chauffeur. The adventure grows in excitement and mystery until he chances upon the photograph of another man. "My husband," she explains with philosophical serenity. "He is now in a sanitarium for the insane." So she believes, but he has escaped that night. She goes to an adjoining room; her white arm is seen waving; the lover starts to follow her; her dead body is flung out of the room, and the insane husband starts in to strangle Earle. He wakes up to find that he has been shaken out of a sound sleep by the man with whom he had an appointment at the club. Ralph Ince has handled the story within its natural limitations, quickening interest at every step in its progress.

If the same could be said of "Between the Two of Them," it would take superior rank, for it is fine play, admirably set and interpreted. Sidney Drew undertakes a serious role with the usual result—people expect to laugh at any moment—some of them do when there is no occasion for merriment—they bubble over. Both Drew and Mrs. Sidney perform in serious roles with discriminating taste—they are convincing in all that I have seen them do, but the natural length of "Between the Two of Them" is two reels. An audience compelled to sit and watch Mr. Drew put on his coat, pack up his things, write long letters, move in and out of doors and through hallways, is liable to be lulled into gentle slumber, or, at least, it will never be roused to unseemly enthusiasm.

The story is that of an intelligent wife materially aiding her husband in a critical revision of a contest play he has written. Fearing that he will not accept her suggestions, she conspires with a dramatic critic in affluent circumstances to send a second version to the contest. Her version wins, but she arouses the distrust of her husband by her unexplained interviews with the affluent critic and he nearly chokes her to death when she tacitly acknowledges her secret visits. The husband realizes his error when his play is produced and returns home to sue for pardon. Domestic misunderstandings afford a rich field for the playwright, but they are most interesting when they are brought about by sex differences. Delightful in comedy, Drew and Mrs. Sidney need some bigger opportunity to demonstrate their ability in serious roles.

"The Pursuit Eternal"

Something Original in a Two-Reel Fantastical Romance Appearing on the Universal Program under the Imp Brand.

Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald.

THE author of the story of this production has struck rather an original note, in spite of the fact that he has gone for the character of the story back to the days of romanticism and fairy tales.

As far as the reality of the picture goes, it is not intended, so we infer, that it should have much of this element. It has as many productions have not, a combined usefulness in being able to entertain children as well as adults.

John B. Clymer has written the story, and Stuart Paton has directed its conversion into film. This latter has been done with a pretty regard for the spirit of romance. Frances Nelson plays charmingly the role of the young woman who, tired of the prosaic life, fell to reading a book on the knights of old who were bold and brave, and dreamed that she was a maiden fair of those olden days, and that her knight had with his sword fought his way to her side. Curtis Benton plays the part of the young man who had similar sentiments regarding his uneventful existence. He also has a dream. The story culminates in a most thrilling and interesting manner, when the maiden is kidnapped by the agents of a secret band to which her father belongs, and is taken to the headquarters of the band, where but for the interference of the modern knight, who overcomes his adversaries, dons the cloak and mask of one of them, the lady, and the last felled culprit would have been joined in bonds of holy wedlock, through the cruel wishes of her financially unbalanced father.

The modern and the ancient have been happily blended in the picture, and the impression left with the spectator is that he has been looking at a modern fairy tale which has succeeded, in spite of any compunctions which he might have on the matter, in interesting him. The production has been well staged, and is truly artistic. Photographically speaking it is good, and has the promise of being an excellent seller.

"The Lone Star Rush"

A Stirring Tale of the Australian Gold Fields, Produced by the Climax Company.

Reviewed by Edward Weitzel.

TO HOLD the attention of an audience through five reels of adventure with only a slight love story and two female characters to leaven the preponderance of males, material of an absorbing nature is required, and it must be fashioned into a photoplay by a skilled hand that will utilize every opportunity for swift action and unbroken interest. "The Lone Star Rush" meets both of these requirements.

Adapted from the novel of the same name by Edmund Mitchell, the author of "The Lone Star Rush" is also the producer of the film version, and has succeeded in reproducing the atmosphere and depicting life in the Australian wilds, with convincing effect. The story starts off briskly, and never lags. An aged prospector is saved from perishing of thirst in the Australian desert by young Harry Murray. The old man has located, as he supposes, a valuable gold claim, half of which he gives to his preserver. His map is stolen by an unscrupulous adventurer named Potosi Jim, the thief, thus getting hold of the prospect, which does not turn out to be a rich find, after all. Murray and an elder brother go farther into the desert and come upon the skeleton of a shipwrecked sailor who, over two centuries before, had located an extensive deposit of placer gold and left a store of the precious nuggets. Aided by a map, also left by the sailor, Murray finds the nuggets and their source. The news of his discovery leads to a record-breaking rush to the new gold fields, the incidents of this exodus being flashed on the screen in a series of spirited and amusing scenes.

The defeating of the villainous Potosi Jim,—who fairly exhausts the bag of knavish tricks and dastardly deeds,—and the winning of the proper young woman, are matters of mere detail to young Murray, and everything comes to a comfortable conclusion.

The best things about "The Lone Star Rush" are the refreshing breath of outdoor life that blows through it, and the red-blooded manhood that generally accompanies existence in the open. Producer Mitchell has caught the spirit of his subject and visualized it with striking fidelity to fact, and with gratifying results. The fever engendered in the blood of man by his quest for gold, starts with the opening scene, and this eager unrest is maintained all through the progress of the melodrama. The work of the cameraman belongs in grade A, and the cast is equal to all requirements. "The Lone Star Rush" should yield a golden reward for its promoters.

Janet Beecher in "Fine Feathers."

The announcement that the Cosmos Feature Film Corporation is to present Miss Janet Beecher in the photoplay version of "Fine Feathers," by Eugene Walter, will undoubtedly prove of interest to exhibitors and photoplay goers throughout the country. Janet Beecher is so well-known to theater goers that it is hardly necessary for an introduction. Statuesque, beautiful, a woman of arts and possessing complete mastery of stage craft, Miss Beecher has appeared in many prominent productions and in the support of many equally prominent artists. The most recent and probably the best recollected play, and one in which Miss Beecher's acting received the unanimous support and acclaim of the press, was in "The Concert," with Leo Ditrichstein.

drama deals with two brothers, one of whom inherits a craving for liquor from his sire, both sons being in love with the same woman. The struggles of the intemperate brother, also those of his father and his father's best friend, to throw off the shackles of the Rum Fiend, and their final triumph, are told with all of Mr. Reid's comprehensive knowledge of melodramatic values. There is no mistaking the meaning of the scenes nor the motives which actuate the characters. He who looks may understand.

Allegorical personages—the "Angel of Prohibition," "Intelligence," "Mephistopheles," and "Demon of Rum"—appear at frequent intervals during the action of the drama, and try to sway the unhappy victims of the drink habit, either for good or for evil. Secretary Bryan, Hobson and the group of United States Senators that favor the temperance cause also appear in the film and smile their approval of the good work. Even the birth of Christ is shown.

"Prohibition" is intended for the masses; for the public that once supported the most inexpensive grade of melodrama. It fulfils its mission. Thurlow Bergen, David Wall, Chas. Trowbridge, Chas. Dow Clark and Maude Westbrook give the film its full acting worth.

"The Great European War"

Picture Playhouse Film Company Releases Big War Series Comprising Eight Reels of Interesting Material.

Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald.

THIS series of war films, which is under the control of the Picture Playhouse Film Company, give evidence of being obtained under considerable difficulty. The many different scenes, some of them merely glimpses into the thick of the fight, are apparently authentic. There is no reason to doubt that they have been taken in the vicinity of, and on the field of battle. The photography is as good as could be expected when we consider that the camera man was obliged to snap up what he could, without regard for atmospheric or lighting conditions.

A great tribute to the Picture Playhouse War series is the fact that Edwin Emerson, war correspondent, has, after viewing the films, written a letter under his personal signature to the Picture Playhouse Company endorsing the authenticity of the pictures, many of the scenes being identified by him as being identical with incidents which he himself had viewed.

The series takes us back to the commencement of the war, and covers principally the first three or four months of the conflict. The famous personages in connection with the war, such as Kaiser William, King Albert of Belgium, President Poincaire, King George of England and others equally illustrious, are introduced in connection with various important incidents. We see also a German Zeppelin flying over Brussels, the retreat of the Belgian army from Antwerp, German machine guns in action on the Yser Canal, various scenes on battlefields upon which the bursting shrapnel can be distinctly seen, battle ships in the North Sea, the pursuit of the Goeben and Breslau, and other scenes of interest too numerous to mention. One of the most remarkable of these scenes is one showing an onrush of artillery over a field of deep and hazy perspective. Again the shadow of the camera man can be seen in the foreground as he grinds off a picture of an advance of German or French cavalry.

The series is an intensely interesting one, and is valuable as a record of some of the main incidents of the greatest war of history.

Exciting War Drama Presenting Jane Gail in the Role of a Secret Service Agent—Handled by the Cosmofotofilm Company.

FRANK FOWELL and George Loane Tucker are credited with the authorship of this cleverly arranged four-part melodrama, produced by the London Film Company under the direction of Mr. Tucker. Jane Gail, always an accomplished actress, is the featured player, assisted by Douglas Munro, Lewis Gilbert, Wyndham Guise and Gerald Ames. Apparently the scenes were photographed in or near London during the opening weeks of the war, with which the story is concerned.

For the purpose of their plot, the authors imagined two apparently law-abiding German merchants, who in reality are government spies, intent on blowing up a train carrying English troops. The Bergmanns have no idea that their stenographer is "Operative O-18" of the British secret service system, and that by means of a dictograph installed in the office she is gaining the information needed to frustrate their plans. But the girl is caught, chloroformed, held captive and otherwise subjected to the treatment familiar to young women caught operating a dictograph under such compromising circumstances. Meanwhile other members of the secret service establishment are following clues by which they may be able to avert the disaster.

The high merit of the film is found in the incessant action that is plausible in its melodramatic way. Events are made to follow each other in logical sequence, and it will be a far-sighted spectator, indeed, who foresees what is coming next. The story keeps building up without any dull lapses or unnecessary scenes and in the concluding reel there is a quantity of the most vivid sort of action while the troop train is rushing to what seems certain destruction. Needless to say, the catastrophe is prevented and "O-18" is hailed as a heroine.

United Film Service Stars.

Among the players being starred or featured by the different studios of the United Film Service producers are Ethel Grandin, Josephine West, Fred Church, Lillian Hamilton, Edythe Sterling, Marian Swayne, Joseph Levering, James Aubrey, Walter Kendig, "Alkali Ike" Carney, Harry Mack, Viola Brown, Dot Farley, Charles De Forrest, Dolly Larkin, George Larkin, Otto Kruger, Raymond Zell, William V. Mong, and Harry Kelly with his new company of Cameo comedians.

The several producing companies, which have all perfected their organizations and built up the strong stock companies that are appearing on the United Film Service Program each week, are in a position to increase their number of productions at any time so that the United Program will consist of from twenty-one to twenty-eight releases a week.

"Niobe"

Famous Players Release a Fanciful Comedy with Hazel Dawn in the Title Role.

Reviewed by Lynde Denig.

"NIOBE," as presented in five reels by the Famous Players, with Hazel Dawn in the title role, is fittingly termed fanciful comedy. It offers something different in the way of a plot, and it offers Miss Dawn—a vision of fairness whether in classic robes or modern fashions, and she tries both. There is humor in the picture, some of it rather obvious farce, some of it more finely pointed comedy, and there is the interest born of a story whose culmination is in doubt. The question confronting Peter Amos Dunn, after the $100,000 statue of Niobe comes to life is, "What shall I do with it, or her?" The question proving unanswerable, the young lady plunges a dagger into her heart and Peter awakes from his nightmare. The statue is still on the pedestal behind the screen.

It is a dream picture based on a whimsical idea. The purchase of the famous figure of Niobe is accounted for; then the art collector goes on to narrate the legend of the beautiful woman, how she was turned to stone and how the image was buried in a volcanic eruption. The falling buildings and panic-stricken populace are depicted in an adequate fashion and altogether the audience is told quite a bit about Niobe before she becomes the animated property of Peter Amos Dunn. Charged electric wires, draped around the figure by careless electricians, are responsible for the restoration of life. And Niobe, in her reincarnation, knows nothing of twentieth century customs as they affect a married man. Her knowledge is that of 3,000 years ago, and never, it appears, had she been taught to restrain her generous impulses. She is both innocent and affectionate, to the discomfiture of her guardian, who tries unsuccessfully to pass her off as the governess engaged to care for his children.

The situation grows more complex and humorous as the story progresses to the tragic climax, relieved of its tragedy when Dunn makes up to greet his wife and family just returned from the theater. Sub-titles are well worded. Charles Abbe is at times over-farcical in his playing of the husband, otherwise his performance is effective. Miss Dawn in appearance and bearing is a quite ideal Niobe.

Kalem's "A Celebrated Case"

Recent Picture Release of This Famous Stage Play a Timely Booking.

One of the most important events of New York's theatrical season, is the all-star revival of "A Celebrated Case," offered at the Empire theater by Charles Frohman and David Belasco. That two of the foremost theatrical magnates should have staged this famous drama, with such stars as Otis Skinner, Nat Goodwin, Frederick De Belleville, Robert Warwick, Helen Ware, Florence Reed, Elita Proctor, Otis and Ann Murdock in the principal roles, indicates that the hold which "A Celebrated Case" has upon the public is greater than ever. This revival is of particular interest to motion picture exhibitors inasmuch as Kalem, fully aware of this popularity, released a four-act, all-star cast photoplay production of "A Celebrated Case," recently.

Despite the prominence of the stars who appear in the stage production, it must suffer in comparison with the photoplay because of the limitations which hamper the stage director. Here is an instance:

In the stage production, mere reference is made concerning Jean Renaud's heroic deed during the Battle of Fontenoy. The description of this battle is left to Sergeant O'Rourke. In the Kalem production, however, this battle is shown on the screen and the fierce charges and countercharges between the English and French armies, and Jean's daring capture of the enemy's standard, are among the big incidents which enthrall the observer who might otherwise be left cold by the mere recital of this event.

Among the Kalem stars who appear in the four-act photoplay production of "A Celebrated Case" are some of the most popular players in the silent drama. They are Alice Joyce, Guy Coombs, Marguerite Courtot, James B. Ross, Harry Millarde, Alice Hollister and others of equal prominence. Shrewd exhibitors will undoubtedly take a leaf out of the Frohman-Belasco book and offer this production to their patrons. It is released through General Film Company's Masterpiece Service.

Runaway June Contest

Strikes a Popular Chord with Both Public and Exhibitors.

THE fifteenth episode of "Runaway June," the Reliance serial by George Randolph Chester, is now being made at the Yonkers studios. The company, which spent five weeks in Bermuda filming the earlier episodes under the direction of Oscar Eagle and his assistant, Harry G. Weir, recently returned to town on the Bermudian.

While the company was absent in Bermuda preparations were being completed in New York for the great "Runaway June" contest. Advertising material and aids to the exhibitor were sent from New York, over the country. This week finds the contest well under way in many of the leading photoplay theaters of the country.

The national campaign of advertising in the leading women's magazines has found response in the imaginations of the women of the country. Letters by the hundred are being received at the Reliance offices, 71 West 23d street, New York, in which the writers ask individually for information.

Exhibitors, too, are writing letters to the Reliance. They feel that the contest will be a big business builder, and that it is on safe ground. If the voting was only to determine the most beautiful woman in the theater, they feel that jealousies would result, but since the contest is a test of real popularity they think that this element of strife will be eliminated.

One exhibitor wrote from Boston: "I once had a baby contest. I thought it was a bright idea. It was. When it was over three babies had received prizes and their mothers were on speaking terms neither with one another, nor with me. There were four fights in the theater the night the result was announced. I swore that I would never have another contest. But when I read of the 'Runaway June' contest, I determined to run it. There is no chance for strife and I want to get in on some of the big national advertising you people are doing."

"A Celebrated Case"

Biograph Soon to Release This Famous Play in Two Reels.

AMONG the important productions scheduled for release in the near future by Biograph Company is the famous play, "A Celebrated Case." Work on this production was started two weeks ago at the Los Angeles studio of the company. It will be one of the series of two-reel Biographs.

The announcement is of especial interest because it coincides with the revival of the play on Broadway. "A Celebrated Case," with an all-star cast, is announced for revival at the Empire theater on April 7. The drama deals with incidents growing out of a French soldier's temporary desertion of the colors during the Franco-Prussian war. His regiment passes near his home and he cannot resist the temptation to visit his wife and child. He entrusts to his wife jewels which he has received from a dying officer; and it is about these jewels that the fate of the soldier and his daughter revolves, after she grows to womanhood and recognizes her father among a group of convicts. He has been unjustly sentenced to life imprisonment for the murder of his wife on that eventful night. She establishes his innocence and at the same time clears away the cloud that, hanging over her parentage, has kept her from her lover's arms.

An unusual opportunity should be afforded for the comparison of the work done by leading players of the screen and of the stage in the same production.

FICTION PICTURES FOR PARAMOUNT.

Beginning April 11th with its first production, "The Spanish Jade," to be shown for the first time in New York at the Broadway Theatre on that date, Fiction Pictures, Inc., the company organized by Louis Joseph Vance, will release its entire output on the Paramount Program.

Mr. Vance engaged Wilfred Lucas and with him as director produced "The Spanish Jade" with Betty Bellairs and "The Taming of Red Butte Western" with that popular legitimate actor A. E. Anson as the featured player. Both pictures are now completed.

Then he gained exclusive photoplay rights to the works of Booth Tarkington, Stewart Edward White, and Joseph Conrad and contracted for the production of fourteen features made from the famous plays or novels of as many famous authors.

In production at the present time are: "The Spenders" by Harry Leon Wilson, author of that amusing story "Ruggles of Red Gap" recently published in the Saturday Evening Post, and "The Conquest of Canaan" by Booth Tarkington.

The "New Exploits of Elaine"

Episode I of the Continuation of the Pathe-Hearst Series Introduces Edwin Arden in an Interesting Character Role.

Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald.

"THE SERPENT SIGN" is the significant title of the first episode of the "New Exploits of Elaine." It is the sign with which Wu Fang (Edwin Arden) accompanies all of his interesting epistles, and is doubtless in a way emblematic of the character of the wily Chinaman.

very discreetly, and introduces easily, without effort whatsoever, what promises to be another break-neck chase. Elaine Dodge is still in love with the detective, Craig Kennedy, Jamieson is still the humorous pal of Kennedy, but into the story has stepped, beside the Chinaman Wu Fang, old Aunt Tabby, an undiminutive, forceful character. For her Elaine has bought a house which formerly belonged to Lawyer Bennett. Here the old lady with her spouse is glad to "rest up" for a while, if she can stand the "haunts" as she calls the mysterious noises which she claims to hear about the place.

The buying of the home for Aunt Tabby brings the opportunity to get in touch with the hiding place of the millions which Bennett claimed to have hidden away. For when Jamieson has nonchalantly lighted his cigarette with an apparently blank paper from among the belongings of the dead lawyer, Kennedy discovers that something has been drawn upon it with sympathetic ink, and proceeds to reveal its meaning, whereupon the climax of this particular episode is brought about in an underground passage beneath the fireplace in Aunt Tabby's sitting room, Kennedy and Jamieson are smothered with poisonous gas from the mysterious box, and the Chinaman gets off with the box and its contents which to his surprise and disgust contains in lieu of the $7,000,000 expected to be found, a peculiarly set ring, of which we will hear more in the next episode. The work of Edwin Arden in his initial appearance promises interesting things for the future.

Terwilliger Back with Plays.

George W. Terwilliger, the Lubin writer and director, who has been in Florida since the first of the year with a specially selected company of Lubin players, has returned to the main studio in Philadelphia. The company included Ormi Hawley, Earl Metcalfe, Kempton Green, Herbert Fortier, Mrs. Fortier, P. Thad Volkman, Mae DeMetz, Hazel Hubbard, William Cooper and Torliev Corneliussen.

Terwilliger had a most successful trip through Florida, during which he produced a number of plays written by himself. These include "The Telegrapher's Peril," a two reel melodrama; "The Last Rebel," a two reel civil war drama, minus battle scenes; "The Man of God," a two reel drama of the castaway type; "Destiny's Skein," a three-reel drama, and "The Insurrection," a three reel South American naval drama, with some unusually spectacular features, and for which Terwilliger secured some remarkably fine pictures of the United States Navy in action.

In addition to these plays, Terwilliger completed Emmett Campbell Hall's play, "Such Things Really Happen," an expose of fake scenario writing schools, and secured exterior scenes for a number of other dramas that will be completed in the Philadelphia studio.

Manager Kulp Wins First Prize.

W. W. Kulp, the Cleveland manager of the World Film Corporation received the first prize for branch managers for the period starting January 25, and ending February 21. This amounts to $100, which is the cause of much competition on the part of the twenty-three World Film managers. Mr. Kulp's field comprises Northern Ohio, and is one in which he is very popular.

"Hearts in Exile"

Clara Kimball Young Gives Sterling Performance in Strong Story of Russian Life, Released by the World Film Corporation.

Reviewed by Lynde Denig.

JOHN OXENHAM'S novel must have told a very good story: either that or Owen Davis made it good when he adapted the incidents to a five-part drama released by the World Film Corporation. Clara Kimball Young is the star under the direction of James Young, who photographed the interiors in the Peerless studio and took his company to Saranac Lake for the exteriors, intended to represent the long, long way to Siberia. The snow scenes are splendid and indispensable to the production of "Hearts in Exile;" but the producers need not enlarge upon scenic attraction in extolling the merits of this picture. They may justly emphasize the worth of Mr. Davis's melodramatic tale and call attention to the unfailingly expressive acting of Miss Young. Furthermore, there is an able supporting company that should not be overlooked, notably the actors playing Serge Palma, Paul Pavlow and the Chief of Police.

Miss Young has the role of Hope, a young Russian woman devoted to the cause of the Patriots. She marries a wealthy man that she may have money with which to aid the poor. The Chief of Police, in love with Hope, has her husband sent to Siberia and a former admirer, a poor doctor whom she really loves, is sentenced to the Provinces. The husband and the doctor change places and in time Hope, who has followed the prisoners to Siberia, accepts Paul, believing her husband to be dead. Eventually he is killed that the story may end happily, but not until Mr. Davis has made the most of a number of dramatic meetings and misunderstandings.

Director Young opens the picture at a fast tempo, a trifle too fast, perhaps, but soon strikes a more natural pace and the acting profits in consequence. In depicting life in Siberia he allowed his two chief characters a cozy little cabin, hardly suggestive of the loathsome quarters supposed to be allotted exiles. This approach to comfort may be accounted for by Paul's appointment as prison doctor. The ride for freedom over the frozen lake, the plunge through a hole in the ice and the final escape of Hope and Paul, provide tense scenes exceedingly well handled. All of the important characters were suitably cast and Director Young was fortunate in his choice of "supers." "Hearts in Exile" was cordially received at the New York Hippodrome.

Hires Special Train for "The Commuters."

One of the last scenes in George Kleine's "The Commuters" was completed last week when an entire special train on the Erie Railroad was hired to finish those scenes in which Larry Brice, his friend Rolliston and their new-found acquaintance in the person of "Sammy," the cabaret orchestra leader, start homeward after a wild night in the restaurants.

This is one of the funniest scenes in the picture and in order to get all the humor possible from the situation, the director decided to engage the special train which consisted of an engine, baggage car and four coaches.

Florence Tempest Appears in Pictures.

It is no easy matter to suddenly drop out of a world of music and dancing, where you have had the enthusiastic response of an appreciative audience, and confront the eye of a moving picture camera, but it can be done, and done well. Florence Tempest demonstrated this when she took a temporary leave of absence from the vaudeville team, "Tempest and Sunshine," and contracted with Phil Gleichman to appear in Comedy-Star releases.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

DUSTIN FARNUM IN "CAPTAIN COURTESY."

As its next release, Bosworth, Inc., announces Dustin Farnum, the popular star of both screen and stage in "Captain Courtesy," a thrilling drama of the early California mission days, by Edward Childs Carpenter.

The production of this photoplay was one of the most stupendous undertakings yet attempted by the well known producers and many large scenes were secured in the face of unusual difficulty and expense. A vast ranch was leased especially for the taking of this subject, which offered one of the most beautiful locations in the picturesque country among the mountains. So inaccessible was this location that quarters had to be built for the company in order to avoid the dangerous travelling on the adobe soil during the rainy season and to waste as little time as possible.

Dustin Farnum is supported by an exceptional cast including Herbert Standing, Winnifred Kingston, Courtenay Foote, Carl Von Schiller and Winona Brown, who enacts the role of the padre of the mission; Courtenay Foote, as the spy, Winnifred Kingston, as Eleanor the ward of the padre, Carl Von Schiller as Jocoso, and Winona Brown, in the role of an Indian Servant. "Captain Courtesy" will be released on the Paramount Program, April 19th.

"SOME SOUL OF GOODNESS" (World Film).

Emma Dunn in the touching stage play of "Mother" revealed to us something of the maternal instinct—the unquenchable love of offspring. Miss Dunn, plays the same part in the five reel William A. Brady-World Film Corporation's picturization of the play, which was released several months ago.

"Mother" is a popular and pathetic picture and Mrs. Ohming, who runs the Starland Theater at Michigan City, Indiana, realizing these characteristics of the film and wishful to give the inmates of the State Prison in that city a chance of profiting by its lessons, had the picture shown to them recently.

"There is some soul of goodness in things evil." Several of the convicts appeared genuinely affected and influenced by Emma Dunn's fine, heart reaching powers. One prisoner wrote to the Warden praising the picture for its fidelity to life; whilst the Warden himself quoted specific instances in which, to his knowledge, the self-sacrificing devotion to her children, shown by Miss Dunn, in the film, had induced some flagrantly erring men to turn over new leaves and play the game of life in a more straightforward fashion than before.

Harry Weiss, the World Film manager in Chicago, vouches for the authenticity of this case. Harry produced documents, and therfore must be believed.

The sentiment of the episode is admirable. The world would be a more tolerable place, after all, to live in, if we thought more of our mothers and treated them better than we (most of us) do.

"Your mother is your one disinterested friend in life; and if you offend her, or lose her, you'll suffer indeed." Weiss says the incidents quoted made an impression on him. He's not the only one.

"BUNKS BUNKED" (Mina).

A one-reel comedy featuring Harry LaPearl. Bunk is a wealthy old cronie who insists that his exalted financial position demands that his daughter marry only a rich young man, whose social status is assured. Accordingly, when a count arrives in town, Bunk invites the nobleman to attend a party at his home and to meet his daughter.

Daughter doesn't like papa's idea, for she is in love with a young man who has saved her from the hands of two ruffians who attempted to snatch her purse. She advises her saviour of the situation and after much trouble he succeeds in breaking into the party. With Miss Bunk he decides to break up the affair and when all guests have flown to carry off his prize. His attempts in this direction, while not particularly successful, are the means of providing a whirlwind of fun.

Harry LaPearl plays the favored young man in his usual funny way. Nettie Noges is the daughter, and "Spook" Hanson the count. The comedy is well directed and played, the photography good and clear, and the picture as a whole is quite up to the standard set in previous MinA releases.

TO PRODUCE "THE INNER SHRINE."

The Pre-Eminent Film Company, James Durkin, director, has purchased through National Play Bureau, (A. G. Delamater), the film rights for Channing Pollock's play, "The Inner Shrine." Miss Maude Fealey will be starred in this production.

"MAVIS OF THE GLEN" (Laemmle).

Ella Hall makes a charming figure in "Mavis of the Glen," a three-reel Laemmle drama which is to be released on April 21. The heroine of "The Master Key" serial makes a delightfully winsome little mountain girl and her fair blonde beauty was never seen to better advantage in the latest of Robert Leonard's feature releases.

Supporting Robert Leonard and Miss Hall in the cast are Harry Carter and Robert Chandler. Most of the action takes place along the sea-coast of Southern California. One of the smaller Universal yachts was used in the taking of the picture. Incidentally, Louise Orth is presented, just for the one picture, in a serious play. "The Lillian Russell of the Pacific Coast" is too badly needed in those screaming L-Ko's, however, to enable Director Leonard to use her often in his feature productions.

That inimitable Billie Richie would raise a long wild howl if his pictures were robbed of the fair-haired beauty and so it is planned to return Miss Orth to him at the earliest possible moment so there won't be any hard feelings in comedy lane.

In "Mavis of the Glen" Ella Hall enacts the role of a simple mountain lass who marries a society man. Her mother-in-law makes the pretty little girl feel her position keenly and, hurt by her husband's neglect, the girl of the glen deliberately sets out to make herself the most attractive weedless widow in the Los Angeles millionaire colony. Her success and the amusing complications which follow bring the feature to a happy conclusion.

"FRAUDS" (Essanay).

A knotty problem is developed in "Frauds," a three-reel photodrama by Harry Sheldon, released May 1. It deals with the world of the criminal class, in which two crooks plot to blackmail wealthy men by using a girl as their tool. In this case, however, the girl they employed is a detective seeking evidence against them. She carries out their plot just as they outline it to her, and at the end when they expect to reap their reward, they find that she has got them in the toils of the law. The problem evolves around the use of a federal law which the two crooks try to make use of to collect their blood money. Edna Mayo and Bryant Washburn, as the leading characters, make this an unusually strong play. It is full of dramatic situations from beginning to end.

LINCOLN WILL PRODUCE "THE WHISTLING MAN."

E. K. Lincoln, of the Lincoln Players, completed negotiations, through Frank Henry Rice, of 145 West 45th street, for the motion picture rights to "The Whistling Man," by Maximilian Foster. "The Whistling Man" needs no introduction to the American reading public, as it was the most widely read serial to receive publication in the Saturday Evening Post.

This is Mr. Foster's first dip into the motion picture field, and the combined efforts of Mr. Foster, as author, and E. K. Lincoln, as producer, will secure results that will bear watching.

STREETS BUILT FOR MUTUAL PICTURE.

W. Christy Cabanne, the Mutual director, already has added authority and distinction to his fame by his work on the second of the now famous Mutual master pictures, "The Lost House," by Richard Harding Davis. He has attained results equally excellent in the production of the master pictures

"Enoch Arden," an adaptation of the poem by Tennyson. In staging these productions Cabanne erected two complete streets behind the Mutual studios. On one of them occurred the realistic fire scenes in "The Lost House." The other is used for "Enoch Arden," and is an early nineteenth century setting.

SWORD PLAY IN "THE FENCING MASTER."

Thomas Jefferson, Frank Bennett and Teddy Sampson play the leading roles in "The Fencing Master," a two-reel Majestic drama in the Mutual program. Monsieur La Rogue conducts a fencing academy and is bringing up his young nephew there when a woman dies in the apartment above. Taking pity on the dead mother's orphaned daughter, he adopts the girl as a playmate for his nephew. The girl studies music. When the two are grow they fall in love.

Old La Rogue, semi-paralyzed, is wheeled to the scene and when his nephew is wounded in shocked into a full recovery. He seizes a sword and in the course of a thrilling fight he succeeds in killing Marode, and the girl and his nephew are happily reunited.

REAL ATMOSPHERE IN "THE LILY OF POVERTY FLAT."

Eight champion broncho busters, rope-throwers and rifle and pistol shots have formed part of the colony of actors and actresses at Boulder Creek, where the California Motion Picture Corporation for the last month has been filming the exterior scenes of the new Bret Harte photoplay, "The Lily of Poverty Flat," in which Beatriz Michelena is starred, and which will be released by the World Film Corporation. They help to make the all-star cast which supports Beatriz Michelena in this five-reel moving picture showing the exciting days of '49 in a Sierra gold mining camp.

"SHE WALKETH ALONE" (American).

Miss Vivian Rich, in the character of a nurse, fills a very distinctive role in "She Walketh Alone," a drama produced by the "Flying A" Company at the American Studios under the direction of Reaves Eason. The emotional acting of this popular screen star is well known to picture lovers and the scenes portraying the nursing of the man she has rejected through his delirium, and guiding his wife into paths of happiness, furnishing a striking example of her talent. Charlotte Burton, David Lythgoe, Jack Richardson also portray clever interpretations which help to make this photoplay a very attractive offering.

IRENE FENWICK IN "THE COMMUTERS."

Irene Fenwick, who has just completed her work as Hetty in George Kleine's filming of "The Commuters," that popular James Forbes' comedy, has some interesting things to say concerning her experience. "'The Commuters' is my first picture," says Miss Fenwick, "and I have certainly learned a great many interesting things about gesture, movement and facial expression that I didn't know before. Acting for motion pictures should be incorporated into every course of training for actors. The training that one derives by watching one's self is most valuable. You learn so many things about your acting through self-criticism, which is, of course, the most stringent. In no other way can you see your own mannerisms, your own characteristics so well. You can see when you are exaggerating and when the facial expression is inadequate.

"But it is hard work," continued Miss Fenwick, who is appearing daily in "The Song of Songs" at the Eltinge Theater, "rehearsals every day besides my regular performances. I hope I will not find too many flaws in my acting. I think success in picture work depends more upon personality, on appealing mannerisms and on true acting ability than on anything else. And while it requires a direct and forceful telling of the story, there is far more room for subtlety and delicate delineation than most observers fancy."

"THE COINER'S GAME" (Pasquali).

"The Coiner's Game," most recent of the Pasquali pictures to arrive in this country for distribution through the Picture Playhouse Film Co., dated for release March 29, introduces as principals Maria Jacobini, Ramolo Giannetti, Jack de Angelis and John Williams, players whose work in previous Pasquali releases has attracted very favorable attention. As the title indicates, the story is one of the operations of counterfeiters.

Scene from "The Coiner's Game" (Picture Playhouse).

The big thrills result when the arch conspirator is hurled into a river to drown in a box in which he has sought refuge from the police, and a little later, when the lovers in the story are rescued in the nick of time as water rising in a subterranean chamber in which they are imprisoned has crept slowly up until only their heads are to be seen. The picture is in five parts.

"THE HOUSE OF SECRETS" (Lubin).

The first installment of the "Road o' Strife," entitled "The House of Secrets," bids fair for a very interesting and dramatic series. The story is evidently woven around the early experiences of Alene, a girl who has been brought up in a very mysterious manner by an old recluse who has never permitted her to see anything of the world, outside of the dingy old house in which they live. Arriving at maturity she unconsciously feels a longing to escape from the dominion of her guardian and the mystery of her surroundings. In an unguarded moment she wanders forth and meets Robert Dane, a worthy man, who opens up to her simple mind a new existence. To him, however, she appears to be demented, and he takes the girl back to her home. There she encounters a gruesome sight—her guardian lies upon the floor covered with blood. She sees no assassin, but grasping the portieres from the outside she sees a hand on which is a strangely designed ring. She flees back in horror to Robert Dane, who with her investigates, but finds that the body has been removed and no signs of the perpetrator of the crime. The cast of this first episode is extremely strong, including Crane Wilbur and Mary Charleson. The story is written by Emmett Campbell Hall.

OUTLOOK FOR LUBIN SPECIALS.

The announcement recently made by Ira M. Lowry, general manager of the Lubin Company of Philadelphia, that his company would release their big special feature productions direct to exhibitors has created much interest. A New York office will be opened in the Mecca Building at 48th street and Broadway within the next few weeks and at about the same time distributing offices will be opened in other large cities.

The Lubin Company has a number of important productions ready for release as soon as distributing plans are arranged in detail. Among these masterpieces are "Eagle's Nest," by Edwin Arden, in which Arden and Romaine Fielding are featured; "The Sporting Duchess," Cecil Raleigh's comedy drama, with Rose Coghlan and Ethel Clayton, and supported by George Soule Spencer; "The Valley of Lost Hope," a spectacular drama by Shannon Fife, in which Romaine Fielding is featured; "The District Attorney," Charles Klein and Harrison Grey Fiske's well-known drama, with George Soule Spencer and Dorothy Bernard; "The College Widow," George Ade's sparkling comedy, featuring Ethel Clayton and George Soule Spencer; "The Evangelist," Sir Henry Arthur Jones' powerful drama, in which Gladys Hanson is starred, supported by George Soule Spencer, and "The Climbers," by Clyde Fitch, in which Gladys Hanson will be featured and supported by an all-star cast of Lubin players.

Among the other big features now in the making or shortly to be produced are "The Light Eternal," by M. V. Merle; "Mrs. Dane's Defense," by Henry Arthur Jones; "The Great Divide," by William Vaughn Moody; "The Woman in the Case," "The Truth," "Captain Jinks," by Clyde Fitch, and a number of other famous plays.

"THE GREAT EXPERIMENT" (Selig).

"The Great Experiment" is a Selig two-reel drama to be released Monday, April 19th. It was produced by Thomas Santschi, from the scenario written by James Oliver Curwood and features Bessie Eyton and Thomas Santschi, in an unusually strong plot. Clear photography, good acting, and entrancing scenery causes this Pictureplay to be classed among the extraordinary releases.

John Morning, rich and without family dreams of the things that might have been. He discovers a poverty-stricken woman, who is fatally injured, takes her to her home where she dies, and John Morning assumes charge of the woman's beautiful daughter of fourteen, Ritta. He determines to try his "great experiment" and Ritta is unaware of whom her benefactor is. He gives the girl wealth and then for five years he buries himself with a scientific expedition in India. In Bombay he encounters Ritta and her chaperon, and learns to love the girl. This fact fills him with grief, for at forty-five he knows he is old enough to be her father. Ritta and Morning become good friends aboard ship. She confides to him of how years ago a stranger had taken her from poverty and despair and given her all she possesses today. She also expresses her gratitude.

Then Ritta discovers the true identity of John Morning. She has learned to love him, and she devises a scheme whereby she will make Morning believe that she loves him without letting him know that she has discovered his identity. Ritta writes a letter to the man back home that she cannot marry him; that she loves another man. She causes John to find this letter, and his despair gives way to joy.

HUGH HOFFMAN'S STEREOPTICON PUBLICITY STUNT.

An automatic stereopticon machine for the exclusive display of photoplayers' portraits is something that has been just inaugurated by Hugh Hoffman, the well known motion picture journalist and publicity man, in the large window of his office in the Gaiety Theater Building, New York, overlooking Long Acre Square. This new scheme has proved to be very successful owing to its practicability and to the prominence of the location, which is in the very heart and center of New York's theater district. This is something brand new in the way of inexpensive publicity for actors and it gives promise of coming decidedly into vogue along this part of Broadway.

The idea of a stereopticon display is not new but in holding it exclusive to people in the photoplay business, Mr. Hoffman has really done something for the profession. Some of the subscribers are:

FAVORITE IN AMERICAN PRODUCTIONS.

Wm. McDonald, who formerly played burlesque lover parts with the Keystone players during the last eight months, has been engaged by Pres. S. S. Hutchinson of the American Film Manufacturing Company and assigned a part in the production of the coming four reel American Distinctive Creation "The Secretary of Frivolous Affairs," as adapted from the novel published by the Bobbs-Merrill Company. Mr. McDonald is also well known on the speaking stage having appeared in a leading part in "Madam Sherry" and other successful plays.

NEW PRODUCING CONCERN JOINS ALLIANCE.

The Dramatic Producing Company, recently organized in Los Angeles by Frank J. Baum have completed all arrangements with President Cobe of the Alliance Films Corporation to release their productions on the Alliance Program. Mr. Baum's first production is "The Little Grey Nun of Belgium," now in the making.

The star of the initial release will be Miss Catherine Countiss, and the supporting company includes David Proctor, who played with Miss Countiss in several of her stage successes, while Betty Pierce, another notable player, will be seen as the Mother Superior. Elaborate settings have been constructed and the properties called for by the 'script have kept a force of workmen busy for the past two weeks.

Mr. Baum, who was a recent visitor in New York, secured the film rights to several of the most successful works published during the past year, and as soon as the present production is completed work will immediately begin upon one of these subjects.

Frances Powers has been retained as director of the new company.

Mr. Powers for a long period was connected with the Famous Players, where "The Ring and the Man," "The Redemption of David Carson," "The Port of Missing Men," and several other pictures were made under his direction.

STANDARD FILM SERVICE GETS STATE RIGHTS.

The Standard Film Service Company, Columbia Building, Cleveland, Ohio, under the management of H. Charnas, has arranged for the exclusive exhibition rights of the Great Northern Film Company's productions for the states of Ohio and Michigan.

Mr. Charnas is favorably known throughout his territory. Three years ago he opened the Cleveland branch of Warner's Features, Inc., and conducted same along lines which rendered this office the most successful. Charnas recently organized the firm of which he is now the head, and which already is recognized as a leading feature exchange in Ohio and Michigan.

Since its organization the firm has opened a branch at 411 Henry Smith Building, Detroit, and others are to be established shortly at Cincinnati, Columbus and Toledo.

VITAGRAPH SECURE TWO POPULAR PLAYS.

The Vitagraph Company announces that it has secured for picturization, two of the most popular plays of the past decade. "The Writing On the Wall," which was originally produced by Olga Nethersole, and "Glorious Betsy," in which Mary Mannering starred with success. Both plays lend themselves admirably to photo-drama production and a strong Vitagraph cast is being selected for their presentation on the screen.

CAMERA CATALOGUE.

One of the recent catalogs received for our files was that of the Motion Picture Apparatus Co., Inc., of New York. It gives illustrations of the English, Moy and Prestwick cameras, of the French Pathe models and the German Ernemann camera, together with descriptions and prices of lenses, tripods and attachments. This company are also agents for several makes of printers, perforators and other laboratory equipment.

KLINE'S "WHO'S WHO," TO BE RELEASED MAY 10.

May 10th has been set as the official release date for the Kleine comedy "Who's Who in Society." This is one of the American-made subjects and features Della Connor, Dan Moyles, Kate Sergeantson, Will H. Powers, and other well known Broadway players. The subject is in four parts. Bookings are being made through the Kleine Branch Offices for engagements commencing May 10th.

"A SOUL'S TRAGEDY" (United-Ideal).

In the role of "Nell," the little hunchback sister, in a "Soul's Tragedy," the beautiful two-reel drama which will be released on the United Program April 12, the excellent sympathetic character work of Miss Bessie Clark will make her future as an actress of exceptional talent. It is the quiet, sweet unselfish, deep-thinking soul of a girl who has missed the happiness which is the inherent right of every girl because she is a cripple that Miss Clark has to portray, and this she does in every movement of her body and every expression of her face. The two-reel film, "A Soul's Tragedy," is perhaps one of the most truly beautiful pictures which the Ideal Company has recently made.

The splendid work of Miss Clark will only make her still more greatly loved by the followers of the United Program who have come to look for her face when Ideal Films are shown. The part of Mavis is excellently played by Dolly Larkin. "Carl Randall," "Richard Allen" and the little sister "Clara" are convincingly interpreted by George Larkin, Lindsey J. Hall and Clara Horton.

"THE FACE OF FEAR" (Lubin).

In this number the plot of the drama thickens and becomes more intense. A Mystery is solved to the audience, but not to the interested characters of the story. Caleb Jerome, a private banker, confesses to his son, Gilbert that it was he who struck down the old professor, his object being to secure the estate of Alene, which he believed Gershom to possess. In doing so, however, he had sealed his own undoing for the memory of the deed wrecks his reason and every face he meets wears the mask of his victim. The hallucination kills the old banker and his son continues the course of crime that his father had mapped out to secure the fortune. Alene is tenderly cared for by an old Doctor Duncan and his wife. He does not think the girl demented but as sane as was Eve fresh from the hand of God, with simple frankness and purity in her love of Robert Dane, who represses his love thinking it would be unfair to marry him before a greater knowledge of the world enables her to choose a husband wisely. Emmett Campbell Hall has certainly evolved a strange and powerful story and the Lubin company is giving it every advantage.

PICTURE PLAYHOUSE WAR PICTURES.

Working prints of the big European War pictures which are being exploited by the Picture Playhouse Film Co., 71 West Twenty-third Street, New York, were delivered to the company's offices Monday, March 29th, the delivery ending a series of "adventures" quite in keeping with the subject matter on the film. The prints have been distributed to the company's various branch offices throughout the country and exhibitors who have been anxiously awaiting them for a number of weeks will now be able to realize on the pulling power of the pictures. The war pictures have been arranged in two separate sets, each set comprising four reels.

MAKING CHILDREN'S PICTURES.

The demand of the children of the country for motion picture subjects dealing with their lives has become so great that the Reliance is devoting considerable time and talent to childhood themes. Director F. A. Kelsey and a company of three children are now at work in the Los Angeles studios on the latest of these, "The Little Soldier Man," which deals with the adventures of a bad boy who stole a little girl's doll. The doll, played by Bobby Fuehrer, comes to life and avenges its fate upon the boy. Mildred Harris is Mildred, the little girl, while Paul Willis is the bad boy.

BUSINESS GOOD FOR TICKET SELLING DEVICE.

The Automatic Ticket Selling & Cash Register Co. report their March business as the biggest in their history. They have taken on several additional salesmen. Mr. Collier, who is well known to the Moving Picture theater owners, will have charge of the Amusement Park and other interests of the company in and around New Jersey. Mr. Herfield is traveling through New York State. N. Hymans has been traveling through the New England States. E. S. Bowman is out on an extended western trip and Mr. Simeral is looking after the interests of the company through Pennsylvania and Ohio. All of the salesmen are reporting good business and speaking optimistically of business conditions with the moving picture theaters.

UNITED NOW HAS TEN PRODUCERS.

With the addition of the Colonial Motion Picture Corporation, the United Motion Picture Producers, Inc., now form a powerful group of ten large motion picture manufacturing companies contributing weekly releases of one and two reel subjects to the United Program. Of these ten studios, three are located in southern California and produce the "Premier," "Luna" and "Ideal" pictures; one is in Fort Lee, New Jersey, producing the "Superba" pictures; one is in Yonkers, New York, producing the "Starlight" pictures; two are in Flushing, Long Island, producing the "Empress" and "Regent" pictures; one is in Colorado Springs, Colorado, producing the "Lariat" pictures; while "Grandin" pictures are produced in New York City, where the Colonial's big studio, producing the new "Cameo" pictures, is also located.

"THE COMMUTERS," FOR RELEASE APRIL 26TH.

The Kleine Offices announce the release of "The Commuters" featuring Irene Fenwick, April 26th. Bookings are now being made through the various Kleine Offices commencing with that date. "The Commuters" is founded on the successful stage comedy by James Forbes and was filmed in the Kleine New York Studios with a star cast including Charles Judels in the role of "Sammy," George Le Guere as Larry Brice, Dan Moyles, Della Connor and others.

"THE AVENGING CONSCIENCE" AND "THE ESCAPE" RELEASED.

Since "The Birth of a Nation" has opened to such a phenomenal run in New York, it has been decided by the Wico Booking Offices to release two of Griffith's other masterpieces, "The Avenging Conscience" and "The Escape." With one or two exceptions, neither of these features have been released to exhibitors in New York, the Strand theater and a few others having played "The Avenging Conscience," and "The Escape" has been shown at the Cort theater. By releasing these films at this time when New York is Griffith mad, the exhibitor gets the advantage of a twofold advertising medium, as the initials, D. W., have become as well known to the film world as "The Birth of a Nation" itself.

JOHNSON-WILLARD FIGHT PICTURE SLIDES.

From the ringside at Havana to 67 West 23rd street, New York, is a big jump, but the Novelty Slide Company were very fortunate in securing authentic photos of the big championship battle fought on April 5th.

The slides are wonderful views of the big moments of this fistic battle and will prove a big feature for any theater. There are twenty big scenes in the set; the views are all beautifully hand-colored and attractive posters are furnished.

OF A GREAT COMBINATION

EDWARD E. ROSE'S SOUL STIRRING, INTENSE DRAMA

The Rosary

Edward E. Rose, author of the world-famous stage play "The Rosary," has adapted his wonderful story for motion picture production. Opening in Auld Ireland, the life work of Father Kelly leads him across the seas to central Ohio, and later to the Lower East Side of Greater New York. Wonderful lighting effects, true comedy and pathos, a strong plot, and lovely scenic investure make "The Rosary" an unusual Spectacular Special. Kathlyn Williams and her supporting company are featured. A pictureplay that will bring both laughter and tears.

CHARLES HOYT'S GREATEST AMERICAN COMEDY

A Texas Steer

The late Charles Hoyt never wrote a more laughable comedy than "A Texas Steer." It is a comedy of true American life and the logical situations incite honest merriment. Mr. Tyrone Power, the distinguished actor, assumes the leading role of "Maverick Brander," and he has stated that the character appealed to him. Power makes his first appearance in Selig Spectacular Specials in "A Texas Steer" and his delineation of that whole-souled American, "Maverick Brander," is artistic and appealing.

Operators Walk Out

Nashville Picture Houses Left Dark in Middle of Afternoon Shows—An Attempt to Force the Exhibitors to Recognize the Union Which Was Only Recently Formed—Claim That Picture Theater Managers Have Treated Operators Unfairly.

By G. D. Crain, Jr., Chattanooga Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

AT exactly 4.30 o'clock Thursday afternoon, March 25, when the moving picture play houses on Fifth avenue, in Nashville, were crowded to capacity, the operators at the Rex, Crystal, Fifth Avenue, Alhambra, Crescent, Elite and Victoria theaters walked out on a strike and left the patrons sitting in the dark until the services of other operators could be secured. The sudden action was taken in an attempt to force the exhibitors to recognize the union, which was recently organized. E. G. Guill, president of the union, said that the employes were not called out until the owners of the playhouses began discharging operators who had affiliated with the union. He said the matter had been taken up with the employers on the previous Monday, but up until the time the strike had been called no willingness to co-operate had been shown by the exhibitors. The union was formed about three weeks ago with a membership of twenty-five, all members of which are employed by the uptown theaters. Of these all are out on strike except the operators at the Strand, Lincoln and Excel playhouses, the owners of these having signed an agreement on Monday. According to Tony Sudekum, of the Crescent Amusement Company, which operates a chain of about twenty theaters in Kentucky and Tennessee, and of William Wassman, of the Crystal theater, the "walk-out" was entirely unexpected. Mr. Sudekum said on Thursday afternoon that the owners of the theaters should have the perfect right to employ and discharge any one in their employ as they saw fit. He said that there were easily a hundred former operators in Nashville, and that their services could easily be obtained.

METRO BEGINS DISTRIBUTING.

At Chattanooga, Tenn., the Metro Picture Company, recently organized, issued its first release on Monday, March 29. The new corporation has secured the distributing agency for the New York Motion Picture Company, and the Famous Plays and Players Company, covering a territory of eight of the Southern states. Many excellent subjects are promised for Chattanooga through the new concern, including as an opener, "Satan Sanderson," followed by a picture featuring Mrs. Leslie Carter and productions introducing numerous other dramatic stars.

WANTS TO MAKE MEMPHIS FILM.

The Paragon Film Company has a deal on with the Business Men's Club, of Memphis, Tenn., to take several thousand feet of film picturizing the city. Points of interest, as the various parks, the Zoo, the Mississippi river from the bluffs, together with pictures of the city and civic officials as well as society girls are all to be featured in the films. The matter is now up to the publicity department of the Business Men's Club. If accepted the films will probably be shown in about 200 moving picture houses in Tennessee.

STATUETTES OF FILM STARS.

J. L. Roop, of Louisville, a well known statuary of that city, has established a workshop with the S. & P. Film & Supply Company in which he will make plaster of paris casts in life size of the leading moving picture stars. The first form completed has been that of Charlie Chaplin, the well known comedy artist. Paper mache forms are made from the original cast, and over these forms the plaster of paris is worked into life sized figures which carry the expression perfectly. These figures will be made up to sell to the theaters at about $15 to $20, and are designed to be displayed in the lobby entrances when films are shown in which the actors appear.

TENNESSEE BRIEFS.

Rose & Robinson, of Tazewell, Tenn., have purchased the Lyceum theater, of Middlesboro, Ky., which was owned by C. P. Davidson. The new owners will move the equipment to Tazewell, where they expect to open a motion picture house shortly.

An application for a charter of incorporation has been filed by the Metro Picture Corporation, of Chattanooga, which lists its capital stock at $20,000. The incorporators are R. M. Watkins, R. G. Watkins, A. S. Dickinson, D. S. Henderson and Burkett Miller. R. M. Watkins will be the president and general manager of the company. Contracts have been signed with some of the Eastern film corporations whereby the Chattanooga concern will handle a number of the Southern states.

Clyde A. Hayes, 1009 Third avenue, Nashville, Tenn., has asked for prices on moving picture machines and supplies, and would also like to have some data supplied concerning prices of films, etc.

The Cooper theater, of Monterey, Tenn., has just installed a new Powers 6A machine.

At Jefferson City, Tenn., W. W. White, proprietor of the Jefferson, has just installed a new Powers machine and other equipment in his playhouse.

The Dandridge Light & Power Company, of Dandridge, Tenn., has purchased machines and a complete moving picture equipment with which to establish a new theater at Dandridge.

The Monterey Electric Light Company, of Monterey, Tenn., has purchased a $250 Motiograph machine and other equipment for a new theater at Monterey.

The Three Links theater, of Bells, Tenn., has purchased a second hand machine and other equipment with which to operate a small theater at Bells.

Two Powers 6A machines have been purchased by the Dixie, at Shelbyville, Tenn., to replace one old machine which was practically worn out.

At Eastover, Tenn., a small house is to be established by L. D. Henson, who has already purchased a machine and other equipment. The house will seat about 200 people.

JURIES CAN GO TO SHOWS.

Court of Appeals Decides That Jurors Can Be Permitted to See Films.

By G. D. Crain, Jr., Louisville Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

AT Frankfort, Ky., the Court of Appeals handed down an opinion in which it held that a jury trying a murder case is not disqualified because it had been taken to a moving picture show after the case had been submitted to it. This decision was rendered in affirming the Barren County Circuit Court, at Glasgow, Ky., after the lower court had imposed a life sentence in the penitentiary on Milt Mansfield, of Glasgow, Ky., for killing Bob Thurman, a policeman of that city. This decision is likely to have far reaching effects and has stirred up a good deal of interest.

NEW NOVELTY REOPENED.

The New Novelty theater, which was recently purchased from D. Levenson by M. Switow, and formed into a company known as the Kentucky Amusement Company, has been completely remodeled and is handsomer than ever before. This theater is one of the oldest in the city and has been very popular. A formal opening under the new management has just been held, although the house was not closed down while the remodeling was under way. The house has been painted inside and out, new systems of ventilating installed, and a detached box office placed in the lobby. The new management is giving away travel slips with all tickets purchased. These travel slips are in the nature of trading coupons, except that they entitle the holder to mileage on all forms of transportation instead of merchandise. The first picture shown after the formal announcement was a five-act William A. Brady production entitled "What Happened to Jones." A number of other Brady productions are scheduled.

LEXINGTON SUNDAY SHOWS.

At Lexington, Ky., the ministers continue their fight against the exhibitors, and it is hard just now to state what will be the outcome of the contest. The show men claim they do not in any way interfere with church services, as on Sunday they are only open during the afternoon between morning and evening services, and for a brief period at night after the evening services are over. A number of the city officials and a large number of the citizens are strongly opposed to the movement to close down the theaters entirely on Sunday. Mayor J. E. Cassidy recently stated that all of the city commissioners were in favor of Sunday shows and saw no reason or excuse for the action taken by some of the ministers. The Rev. F. J. Spencer, pastor of the Central Christian Church, and chairman of the committee from the ministerial union in charge of the campaign for Sabbath observance in Lexington, recently said: "We believe we have the advocates of a wide open Sunday on the run, and we are now determined to press our advantage into a sweeping victory. The pictures and all other forms of Sabbath violation will be barred from Lexington unless all signs fail. I agree with the Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, who recently spoke in Lexington on the subject, and who said that in order to stop Sunday work we must stop Sunday amusements. That's the whole matter in a nut shell."

A FOOL CALLED "FIRE."

What at first promised to be a small sized panic was started at the Princess theater, at Henderson, Ky., at 10 o'clock on March 25, when a small boy pulled a faucet out of a steam radiator. A big volume of steam escaped which filled the theater. As usual a fool was present who had to yell "Fire!" at the top of his voice. A rush was made for the doors. The crowd had thinned out to some extent by that hour of the night and the older heads present held the people back and prevented any one from being hurt in jamming through the doors.

LOUISVILLE BRIEF NOTES.

The first of the Master-Pictures was shown at the Alamo theater, of Louisville, on March 28. The management of the theater has made arrangements with the Mutual Film Corporation to present the entire output of Master-Pictures at the rate of two each week. The theater is using, in addition to its Wurlitzer-Hope Jones Unit Orchestra, a Hungarian Sextet, which is under the direction of Prof. Louis Miko.

Announcement was recently made by the Gayety theater, a legitimate house at Louisville, that the regular season was over and that moving pictures would start on Easter Sunday. High class musical tabloid and motion pictures will make up the bills.

At the Masonic theater the Hampton Institute films, showing the educational work and uplift movement conducted for the betterment of conditions in the colored race, were recently shown. The house was packed and society folk turned out strong. The two upper balconies were reserved for colored people and were well filled. Besides the moving pictures a number of addresses were delivered and a special quartet, known as the Hampton Institute Quartet, rendered some very interesting old plantation songs.

W. W. George, of Winchester, Ky., has closed a deal with Spahr Swift, whereby Mr. George takes over the Colonial theater, on North Main street. The theater has been very successful and is showing Mutual and Universal programs.

The Ben Ali theater, at Lexington, Ky., has been showing 6,000 feet of European war film, which has just completed a successful run at the Grand Opera House, of Cincinnati.

Fred Sheldon, manager of the S. & P. Film & Supply Company, of Louisville, recently made a short trip to Indianapolis, Ind., to purchase additional films and supplies and confer with some of the film exchanges.

The Ideal Opera House, of Lawrenceburg, Ky., recently purchased a second hand Motiograph machine for use in showing motion pictures at the old opera house.

The Dixie theater, of Taylorsville, Ky., has installed an electric lighting plant, Powers machine and an entire new equipment consisting of a fireproof booth and 340 opera chairs.

A new motion picture house is well under way at New Haven, Ky., and will be ready to open shortly after April 1. Numerous small houses are springing up all over the state just now.

Sherman and John Arn, of Maysville, Ky., have nearly completed arrangements for opening a new motion picture theater at Ewing, Ky., which will show practically the same pictures as are now being shown at their Gem theater at Maysville.

The Pythian Home, at Lexington, Ky., is a new film which is being shown for the benefit of the Knights of Pythias Home in a number of the cities of Kentucky. The film was recently shown at the Grand Opera House of Henderson, Ky.

Following the last performance at the Lyric theater, of Lawrenceburg, Ky., a reel took fire while being wound back. The reel was destroyed, but the house was not damaged or any one hurt. Operator Springate, Manager Bartlett and the box office man, Walker, were on the job at the time and put the fire out with ease.

Mrs. E. S. Hume, of Frankfort, Ky., who has experienced a good deal of trouble in successfully renting her moving picture theater, the Columbia, to responsible parties, is now making arrangements to operate the theater herself. She has secured the services of J. C. Taylor, who was formerly connected with the Gem theater, as manager of the theater, which will be opened shortly. Several attempts have been made to make the theater a paying investment. At the last attempt a combination of vaudeville and moving pictures proved a very successful failure after a three weeks' trial.

ILLINOIS BRIEFS.

The erection of an opera house by a citizens' stock company is projected in Macomb.

John Morrison, who has leased the Princess theater in Rockford from Oscar Holmquist, was in vaudeville and will be his own soloist. He will give a four-reel show.

The Anderson Feature Film Service of Chicago has been incorporated with capital stock of $5,000 to manufacture and deal in motion picture films. The incorporators are Charles A. Anderson, Emil Lowy and M. Corrigan.

The Idylhour at Canton is one of the latest houses booked by the Kriterion service.

Value of Good Sites

Prosperity of Picture Business in Cincinnati Shown by High Rents—Family Theater Is Paying $17,000 Average Rental—Alhambra Renews Lease at Advance of Fifty Per Cent.—The Sun, a Nearby House, Also Valuable.

By Kenneth C. Crain, Cincinnati Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

BOTH the present prosperity of the moving picture business in Cincinnati, and the faith in its future held by those interested in it, are shown by recent leases effected on well-known local houses. The long-time lease, at a high figure, a yearly rental of $17,000 for first ten years and $20,000 for second ten years, which is held on the Family by the company operating that house, was recently referred to in these columns. During the past week two other downtown houses, including the Alhambra, one of the most popular photoplay theaters in the city, have renewed their leases, both being on the property now occupied by them on Fifth street, the other house being the Sun. The Alhambra lease has been made for a term of fifteen years by Charles Weigel, at a figure which is understood to be about 50 per cent. higher than that for the former term, and the management will now proceed with plans for large improvements which have been pending in view of the early expiration of the lease. The size of the house will be considerably increased, in order to enable it to accommodate the larger audiences which are always available, and a handsome marquee will be erected in front. The Sun, which adjoins the Colonial theater, has been leased by Isaac Frankel, who is also interested in the Colonial, for a terms of ten years, at an increase of ten per cent. over the old rental, making the figure for the entire period $60,000. This is considered especially notable in view of the proximity of the larger house, but the Sun has always had a steady and satisfactory business, and Mr. Frankel regarded the prospects as being quite good enough to warrant taking the lease.

PICTURES HELPING MEDICINE.

Popular education in the matter of the operations of the germs which are responsible for so many diseases may be distinctly advanced by the medium of moving pictures, as demonstrated recently in Cincinnati, when Dr. A. O. Zwick, a prominent physician, illustrated a lecture on germs and microbes before a large audience by means of some remarkable moving pictures. The pictures, which were necessarily taken by means of the ultra-microscope and other modern instruments, showed the various phases of germ development graphically to the several hundred medical students and others who attended the lecture. Similar methods will probably be used in local medical schools in handling many branches of investigation, especially in view of the fact that a local film company is preparing to produce and market films showing the details of difficult operations by noted surgeons.

"DIXIE, THE CAVE GIRL."

The Moving Picture World has received a note from the Cincinnati Motion Picture Company, calling our attention to an error in this column last week. We quote a paragraph:

"Mr. J. Law Sipple, manager of the Mammoth Cave Attractions now en toure with 'Dixie, the Cave Girl,' accompanied by a staff of motion picture experts, should be given credit for this picture undertaking and not we. Mr. Sipple favored us with the developing and printing part of the contract on account of our superior facilities for handling the same and the work so far executed is above the average in photography."

The picture, as has been reported, is a travel film being taken for one of the big railroads and will show how many interesting things there are to be seen in the South from Havana, Cuba, to Mammoth Cave, Ky.

FAIRER TAX RATES.

Youngstown Picture Exhibitors Work for More Equitable License Fees.

The moving picture exhibitors of Youngstown, O., are taking advantage of the action of the council in readjusting license fees for theaters and amusement enterprises of all sorts, to get the charges fixed on a more equitable basis than is the case at present. The theatrical license now charged is fifty dollars a year for all, no distinction being made between large and small houses, or between moving picture houses and the other theaters, which charge a considerably higher admission. The ordinance has been drawn to differentiate between the several kinds and sizes of houses, with a maximum of $100 or $150 for the large theaters, smaller ones to pay $50 and the smallest to pay $25 or $30, the fees being based entirely on seating capacity.

FIVE CENT FEATURE MATINEES.

Manager Clifford, of the Clifford theater at Urbana, has struck a popular note in establishing matinees, at which features are shown at five cents, instead of at ten; and, as usual with matinees, ladies have proved to be the best customers of the house on these occasions. So enthusiastic was the approval expressed of the pictures shown at the first of these matiness, which included the World production of "The Wishing Ring," that Manager Clifford designated the ladies as his "Board of Censors," and invited them to attend subsequent performances, which it is understood they did, with excellent results on the attendance records.

START WORK ON NEW THEATER.

Work is going ahead rapidly on the Western Hills theater, the handsome moving picture house on Price Hill, which will be by far the most pretentious theater in that suburb. The architects, Zettel & Rapp, let contracts last week for various parts of the work, and unless there is some unforeseen interruption, the house will be placed in operation during the present summer, or at any rate, in ample time for the opening of the next season's business.

CINCINNATI BRIEFS.

Travel pictures taken and shown by Dr. George A. Dorsey of numerous interesting phases of life and work in the Far East, drew splendidly at the Victoria, in Dayton, last week, being especially featured by the management for the benefit of the school children. The fact that such pictures have a special pulling power, by reason of the general approval of them by parents and school authorities, is being recognized by progressive exhibitors such as the manager of the Victoria, and proper steps are accordingly taken to inform people that they are being shown.

Fred Beloat, John Reissinger and Orville Purdy, of Sciotoville, O., will construct an airdome for summer business, to have a seating capacity of 450. Arthur Devoss, an architect of Portsmouth, O., will prepare the plans and the work will begin at once.

Manager Kress, of May's Opera House, in Piqua, O., which has been showing moving pictures for some time, has secured an excellent orchestra of three pieces, formerly employed at the Bijou theater, with a special view of providing the Paramount program, which is shown at this house, with adequate music. The innovation has met with distinct success.

"Liberty Bell" Slides

Slides Made to Help the Exhibitors Fight Unsatisfactory State Censorship Are Being Shown in Several Harrisburg Theaters—State Censor Breitinger Said to Have Threatened to Arrest Managers Showing Them—Claim Slides Are Not Censorable.

Special to Moving Picture World by Philadelphia News Service.

THE Liberty Bell slides, calculated to aid the cause of the moving picture exhibitors in their fight to have the state censorship law repealed, were recently shown in several of the moving picture theaters of Harrisburg for the first time. Two slides are in each set sent out from the Exhibitor's headquarters in Philadelphia for use throughout the state. The slides are colored and one shows a bell without a crack. It contains the words: "Public opinion favors laws against bad pictures, but abhors the tyranny of censorship." The second slide shows a cracked bell and reads: "It proclaimed liberty to all the people. Censorship put the crack in it."

The slides call on theater patrons to use their influence with the lawmakers of their respective communities to induce them to vote for the repeal of the censorship law. They are being shown despite the fact that they have not been approved by the state censors, and notwithstanding J. Louis Breitinger, the chief censor, has threatened, it is said, to arrest exhibitors displaying the pictures. The exhibitors contend that the board has no right under the law to put a ban on such pictures, inasmuch as they are not films.

GUSTAVE FROHMAN WANTS EVEN STRICTER CENSORSHIP

In Address to Philadelphia City Business Club Film Maker Favors Censor Laws.

Gustave Frohman, president of the Frohman Amusement Company, in a recent address before members of the City Business Club, in the Hotel Adelphia, urged a strict censorship on moving pictures.

"Although I am a producer of moving picture films," he began, "I am firmly convinced that the films, and particularly those depicting social problems, should be subjected to a strict censorship. Stand by your censorship law, and, in fact, make them more drastic. I regret to admit that several producers, if given a free hand, would flood the city with foul, immoral pictures that would demoralize youth.

"If you wish to read books of a questionable character, that perhaps is your right; but you have no right to permit men to parade unwholesome and immoral pictures before your wives and children. Don't be so absorbed in the fine acting of the players that you lose sight of the theme."

Mr. Frohman related his experiences in the theatrical world, and paid the women of Philadelphia a handsome tribute. "For nearly fifty years," he asserted, "I have had the privilege of standing before the entrance of your theaters, and in no city of the country, not excepting New York, have I seen so many beautiful and well dressed women."

The dinner was attended by more than 100 business men, and informal talks were made by Clarence P. King, president of the Washington Railway and Electric Company; John P. Connolly, chairman of council's finanance committee; Henry S. Brown, of the New York Herald, and George J. Worthy, of the Frohman Amusement Company. The latter, discussing the progress of the moving picture business, said that nearly $2,000,000 a week is spent by the public in the 16,000 moving picture theaters throughout the country.

TEACHING THE BIBLE BY FILMS.

Modern methods of teaching the Gospel with the aid of moving pictures, charts, blackboards and diagrams were recently demonstrated at a convention of Gospel illustrators in the East Baptist Church at Kensington. Nearly 1,500 delegates from all over the country were in attendance. The wonderful results obtained by the use of the picture film were elaborated upon. It was shown that in many cases where a talk failed to reach the heart of the listener, when it was accompanied by moving pictures much better results were obtained.

COURSE IN SCRIPT MAKING.

Trenton "State Gazette" Gives Lessons to Budding Picture Authors—Looking for Genius.

Great interest has been aroused among the good citizens of Trenton by the free course in photo-playwriting being run by the "State Gazette," one of the leading newspapers of that place. Folks of all ages and characters are carefully studying the free course column which has been inaugurated for about three weeks. Now there is a reason for all of this prevailing interest. After the last lesson in photoplaywriting has been published, a cash prize will be offered for the three best scenarios sent to the editor of the paper, the same to be written exclusively by the strictly amateur students who have been perusing the daily lessons. A genius may be developed in this manner and most every one thereabouts is paying strict attention to the articles in order to be in a position to do justice to themselves in the final contest.

PICTURES WILL SHOW HOW TO CLEAN UP CITY

During Reading's Official Clean-Up Week Theaters Will Play Part.

Reading's official cleanup week will be the last in April, the 26th to the 30th. While the city is not as untidy this year as it was last year, there is still plenty of room for improvement in some sections, according to the statement of Dr. Charles P. Henry, city health officer. Doctor Henry is co-operating with the Chamber of Commerce health and sanitation committee and the Berk's County Firemen's Association.

Moving pictures will play a part in this movement for the cleaning of the city. Every moving picture theater in the town has enlisted. The school children will be given an afternoon off and will visit the shows, where they will see films portraying extra dirty back lots and alleys and disease and fly-breeding drains and gutters.

EAST STROUDSBURG STUDIO PLANS MAY FAIL.

Whether East Stroudsburg will land the moving picture film company, the representatives of which recently appeared before the last meeting of the Board of Trade, now seems doubtful.

The firm offers to raise $10,000 toward purchasing the site, of about 15 acres, and building the studio and other necessary buildings amounting to about $35,000, providing the Board of Trade carries the other $25,000 as a first mortgage against the property.

This the committee thought to be out of reason and made a proposition which they will present to the firm. The Board of Trade will purchase a site for the company providing they will erect buildings upon it to the amount of $10,000 or more and the Board of Trade to hold first mortgage until the price of the land is paid. This seemed unreasonable to the company and very reasonable to the committee, as there would be no possible chance for a failure.

Providing the board would accept their offer and the firm should discontinue business at the end of the first year, the only security they would have would be the property, which is useless for any other business.

The buildings the firm demanded are a studio with a roof and three sides of glass and a work department and a brick office building. The 15 acres of land could be purchased for about $4,000.

PHILADELPHIA BRIEFS.

It has recently been reported that the new picture house at Bordentown, N. J., will, when completed, represent an expenditure of about $15,000. Mercantini & Belli, present owners of the Masonic Hall theater, at Bordentown, are projecting the proposition.

Charles E. Futcher is erecting a new motion picture theater at 6149 Larchwood avenue, West Philadelphia, at a cost of about $15,000.

The first of a series of motion pictures on Biblical themes was recently shown at the picture theater on South Thirteenth street, Harrisburg, Pa. The pictures, under the auspices of the Allison Hill Men's Christian Association, will be shown on Sunday afternoons only.

Abraham Canton has taken title from Kahn & Greenberg to the moving picture theater 2532-34 North Broad street, lot 50 by 178 feet, subject to a mortgage of $40,000. The assessed valuation of the property is $45,000.

The management of the Opera House, Eleventh and Chestnut streets, announces that it has secured D. W. Griffith's production, "The Avenging Conscience," for an indefinite engagement at the Opera House, beginning on Monday, April 5.

Crane Wilbur, now starring in the new Lubin serial, "The Road of Strife," will lead the grand march with Cecilea Santon, of the Imp Universal Company, at the motion picture operators' ball, which will be held at Musical Fund hall in a couple of weeks. A reception and dance will be the main features of the ball.

IN PITTSBURGH.

The West End Family theater, on Main street, West End, Pittsburgh, Pa., has installed a Wurlitzer orchestra piano, which is reported to be giving excellent satisfaction.

Messrs. Kostes & Kiddes, who conduct the Photoplay and Lyric theaters, in Jeanette, Pa., are completing arrangements to close a deal for the sale of the Lyric so as to give more attention to their large house.

The Co-Operative Amusement Company, of Erie, Pa., has purchased from S. S. Range the Venus theater, and from Mr. Fairgrave the Grand, two theaters occupying adjoining locations in State street, Erie. It is expected that both houses will be remodeled and converted into one large theater.

Constable Brothers Company won the contract to build $55,000 moving picture theater at 920 State street, Erie, Pa., last week. A Buffalo concern will build. Leo Wertheiner, agent for the new Wilkay theater, represents the Bison City company.

Fire of unknown origin destroyed the Olympic theater at Connellsville, Pa., last week. The loss is estimated at $40,000.

Plans for the new moving picture theater to be erected on West Eighteenth street, between Cherry and Walnut streets, Erie, Pa., have been approved. The building is to be a two-story structure, 135 feet in length and 27 feet wide. It will be constructed of cement and tile, absolutely fireproof. The seating capacity of this house will be 400. H. E. Hammond is the owner.

Dr. J. Lorenz, of Ambridge, Pa., is having plans prepared for the erection of a moving picture theater which will measure 44x110 feet, on a plot of ground on Main street, which is owned by him. This house will be up-to-date in every respect and have a capacity of about 600. Work will be started about May 1.

An application for a Pennsylvania State charter of incorporation has been made by Maurice C. Stayer, Harry G. Gardner, Maude O. Stayer and Jean M. Gardner for an intended corporation to be called "Johnstown Lyric Amusement Company," the character and object of which is acquiring, maintaining, operating theaters, opera houses and other places of amusement, and booking and presenting or exhibiting therein motion pictures, plays, operas, vaudeville and amusements of all kinds; to lease, purchase and otherwise acquire and own such real estate as may be necessary in which to conduct the same.

The Cameraphone theater, Fifth avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., ran the first of the master pictures, "The Quest," to an exceptional capacity, last week, and it was received by every one very favorably.

The Continental Feature Film Company, Penn avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., has been the busiest office in this city the last few weeks, on the strength of the new Master Picture Service which is distributed by that office. Charles Meck has recently been installed as booker at this office, and Dunham Brash has been transferred from the main office of the Mutual Film Corporation to this office as auditor.

H. E. Nichols and Paul Qualddrough, two well known members of the Pittsburgh office of the General Film Company, handed in their resignations last week. H. E. Nichols was manager, while Paul Qualddrough took care of the poster department. Both are first-class men in filmland.

Mr. Rigby, a young man of considerable experience in the film business, is now manager of the New theater, 243 Fifth avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa.

W. J. Marion, now manager of the Quality theater, Fifth avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., had eleven years' experience in all branches of the picture business in Pittsburgh, Chicago, West Virginia towns, Ohio and Pennsylvania.

The Quality, a new Fifth avenue theater, owned by W. P. Witherow, of the Witherow Steel Company, is showing his policy and enterprise by using Mutual Master Pictures.

LOOKING FOR PRETTIEST GIRL IN SMOKY CITY.

A. S. Davis, of the Independent Film Exchange, Pittsburgh, Pa., has sent out the following letter to all his patrons:

Dear Sir—The Pittsburgh Press has decided to conduct the Beauty Contest for the Universal Film Company.

The Pittsburgh Press has decided to act as the medium through which we can secure the most beautiful girl in Pittsburgh, in the western part of Pennsylvania. Starting with an early issue, the Pittsburgh Press is going to publish a coupon for contestants and we will furnish slides which will announce that the details of the contest can be read in the Pittsburgh Press.

It is our intention to have photographs of contestants submitted to the Pittsburgh Press and after a selection has been made of the most beautiful girls whose photographs have been submitted, about twelve of them will be selected for the readers of the Pittsburgh Press to vote upon. A voting coupon will appear in the newspaper each day and the winner of the contest will receive a free trip to Universal City, the Panama-Pacific Exposition and the San Diego Exposition.

Some girl from your town may have a chance to win the contest. It is up to you to help the thing along. Should the Pittsburgh Press decide to make any change in the plan as outlined above, we would appreciate it if you would comply with their request and also to distribute as much of the material they send to you as possible.

Yours very truly,
Independent Film Exchange, Inc.

Pennsylvania Censorship

Picture Men of Western Part of the State Gratified by Demands of Arthur Lucas That State Censor Breitinger Give an Accounting to Exchanges on Operating Expenses—There Is a Feeling That Assessments Have Been Unjust.

Special to Moving Picture World from Pittsburgh News Service.

THE entire western section of Pennsylvania is applauding and commenting favorably upon the decided determined stand taken by Arthur Lucas, district manager of the Mutual Film Corporation, in demanding that an accounting be given the exchanges who have contributed to the maintenance and support of projection rooms and operating expenses in Philadelphia.

The injustice of state censorship especially, as passed upon by J. Louis Breitinger, State Censor, is only now reaching the surface in the burden not only on the producing and distributing companies, but upon the individual exhibitor as well.

Those exhibitors and exchange representatives for the western part of the state are of one accord in supporting the charges filed by Messrs. Lucas, Wheeler, Jack Levy, etc., which were influenced by the determination of Mr. Lucas, whose firmness and desire for nothing but a square deal for all concerned has been evidenced in every action and declaration.

If public opinion and sentiment were appealed to in a matter of such vital importance to the industry, and public at large, the people of Pennsylvania would unanimously declare against something which only operates as a detriment to the greatest, most powerful and influential industry of the age, and were they to know that such tactics as assessing a $2.50 censor fee for every single reel reviewed by Mr. Breitinger, which is in addition to a charge of $1.27 as a pro rata share per film for maintaining the offices wherein these films are censored, the indignation would even be greater against the perpetration of such laws and requirements, than it now is in the ignorance of the actual facts.

Fred J. Herrington, the anti-censor leader, recently delivered a lecture in the Imperial theater, in New Kensington, Pa., which was largely attended. Mr. Harrington's views on the freedom of the films was heartily indorsed by a Lutheran minister who was present.

It is expected that similar meetings will be held at Washington and Vandergrift, Pa. A one-reel farce, "Pruning the Movies," a Nestor-Universal release, was shown in connection with the lecture.

Representative A. C. Stein, of Pittsburgh, Pa., introduced a bill in Harrisburg, Pa., last week to amend the picture censor act by reducing fee for examination from $2.50 to 50 cents for each moving picture or stereopticon view, irrespective of number of films or reels.

MEYERSDALE THEATER BURNED.

The Donges theater, Meyersdale, Pa., was burned to the ground Thursday, March 18, entailing a loss of about $70,000, the loss nearly all falling on George Donges, who, owing to the high insurance rates, allowed several policies to lapse recently and had his buildings insured for less than half of their actual value.

The origin of the fire is unknown. It started early in the morning, and before the firemen could subdue the flames the building was totally destroyed.

NIAGARA FILM PLANS STUDIO.

Plans are under way for the construction at North East, Pa., this summer, of a moving picture manufacturing plant, to be built by the Niagara Film Company. The company's offices are in the Marine Bank Building. General Manager W. B. Brigham announced last week that the probable cost of the new building would be between $50,000 and $150,000.

The plant will be built on the site of the North East race track, which includes nearly five acres of land. It will include a studio, a power plant, assembly hall and laboratory. It is expected work will be started by June 1.

With the exception of the studio, to be built of concrete and glass, all other buildings will be constructed with brick and steel.

Besides producing the films at the North East plant, the company will operate a film exchange and own a chain of theaters. Officers of the company are: John McClelland, Albion, president; J. L. Meldon, Erie, secretary and treasurer; W. B. Brigham, general manager; D. C. Walter, assistant manager.

A. J. COBE VISITS PITTSBURGH.

Andrew J Cobe, president of the Alliance Film Corporation, of New York, was in Pittsburgh last week and spent most of his time with A. A. Weiland, who handles the Alliance program for western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio and Kentucky. Mr. Cobe promises some good subjects in the near future.

PITTSBURGH SHORTER ITEMS.

W. W. Spaulding, of Pittsburgh, Pa., has purchased from J. A. Brown two picture houses in Braddock, Pa., the American and Rex. The former is a theater of 250 capacity and the latter has a 380 seating capacity.

Mr. Brown also owns the Mutual and Family theaters, in East Pittsburgh, but will retain these and soon begin remodeling them. A new front will be put in the Mutual, change the floor and put in a quantity of brass railing. The Family has a capacity of 270 and the Mutual 540.

By putting two and two together and crystallizing the gossip of little birds, etc., it seems safe to announce that Ira Aronson is going to give a big dinner to some of the big film men, at which J. E. Hennessey and Mr. Milder of the General Film Company will be among the honor guests. It is said that the affair will be held on the same lines of those in the East, with many of the screen favorites in attendance.

The Edward G. Lang Company has sold for the Pittsburgh Railways Company to G. A. Aiken and others the old car barn property in the corner of Perrysville avenue and Charles street, Northside, Pittsburgh, Pa., for a cash consideration not given. The buyers will erect on the lot a modern moving picture show house, operations to begin at once.

Al. W. Cross, of the Hudson Feature Film Company, in the Lyceum Building, Pittsburgh, Pa., has leased the entire third floor at 212 Fourth avenue, for his shipping department, film and poster rooms. His office will remain in the Lyceum building.

William Schell, well known among amusement people of Western Pennsylvania, has taken temporary charge of the Grand theater at 1915 Carson street, South Side, Pittsburgh, Pa., and will boost it with the intention of selling it. This house has a capacity of 250.

Richard P. Kennedy, of the Shadclite Company, Beaver, Pa., has been awarded the contract for the equipping of the Arsenal theater, 4109 Butler street, Pittsburg, Pa., with the new Shadolite system. The owner of the theater controls a chain of twenty theaters and Mr. Kennedy expects the lights to prove so satisfactory that the whole chain will be equipped.

John H. Sarver, proprietor of the Colonial theater, Braddock, Pa., is increasing his seating capacity from 530 to 600.

Fighting Kansas Law

Drastic Censorship Laws in Kansas About to Be Enforced—Exhibitors and Exchange Men Working Earnestly for Repeal—Effect of Law Will Amount to Prohibition and Put Picture Business on Same Basis with the Saloon.

Special to Moving Picture World by Kansas City News Service.

KANSAS exhibitors and film corporations with branch offices in Kansas City, Missouri, are up in arms and fighting for their right of exhibiting moving pictures in Kansas at a fair profit. Enforcement of the censorship law would practically crush their business. In February the United States Supreme Court upheld the Kansas state law passed two years ago. The law required that the exhibitors pay a censorship fee of $2 a reel for every picture that entered the State. The Mutual Film Corporation contested the law at that time and hung it up in the Supreme Court for two years.

The largest part of the business done by the film companies in Kansas City is in Kansas. The film companies here have the entire State of Kansas and only a small portion of Missouri, for the branches in St. Louis have the bulk of the Missouri territory. The new law if it goes into effect is practically certain to put 99 per cent. of the Kansas exhibitors out of business. Since the Supreme Court rendered the decision against the Mutual company the law has not been in effect, because the State has given the exhibitors and the film companies several days of grace. The fight is now on at the State capital at Topeka. Certain legislators would seem to be really anxious to crush the exhibitors and the moving picture business, for they recently tried to pass a law requiring the exhibitors to pay a license fee of $300 a year. The exhibitors fought that bill and won. Now they are fighting the $2 censorship law. They hope that the people will back them as they did in the other case.

This censorship law is really impossible in view of the stupendous business that is now being done in Kansas. Hundreds of films are going into the State every day, and all would have to be censored, under the law. A shift of men working on a censorship board 8 hours a day, and another shift working 8 hours every night could not get through it. And even if the law were practicable from this standpoint, the fee of $2 a film could not be met by exhibitors without lowering their present high standards. The people would demand moving pictures—and would demand the same quality of shows as given in other states. The exhibitors will have to stand the gaff until the law is changed, or the people will have to do without moving pictures.

The legislators seem inclined to put the moving picture show on the same basis as the saloon is put in other states—on a basis of the minimum number of shows per population, the only logical theory of such a standing being that the shows are nuisances. The people declare that moving picture shows are not only pleasures, but necessities, and important educational factors.

The sentiment and point of viey of the people of Kansas was well expressed at a recent meeting of exhibitors in Kansas, by the brainiest man in the State, one who is recognized as knowing his fellow citizens better than any other, the spokesman for Kansas, the exponent of "The Kansas Language." This was William Allen White, of Emporia, who, at the convention of the Kansas State Exhibitors, said:

"It is my belief that the moving picture is now the highest form of education that we have to-day, and that it will only be a short while until moving pictures take the place and powers that the press has held in America for so many years; and the public has to concede the fact that the newspapers have long been the leading educators of the country."

SHORT KANSAS NOTES.

The Pathe production, "The Life of Our Saviour," is to be shown at the Hutchinson Reformatory, a State institution, at the same time that it is being exhibited at the De Luxe theater in Hutchinson. Special arrangements had to be made with the Pathe Company for letting the pictures go to the State institution, and a representative of the film company will probably accompany the film. Manager Savage of the De Luxe will send the seven reels to the reformatory one at a time during the same period that the film is being exhibited at the theater. While one reel is being shown at the theater, another will be seen by the inmates of the reformatory. J. N. Herr, superintendent of the reformatory, has been eager to show this film to his charges ever since he first heard of it and believes that its moral and educational qualities make it a very important event for the institution.

"The Exploits of Elaine," featuring Miss Pearl White, seems to have been gathering impetus since its first mention. The new Rex theater in Hutchinson, Kan., has a seating capacity of only 350, but when the time came for the opening episode, nearly a thousand persons were gathered in front of the theater. More than 2,500 persons saw the first episode during the afternoon and evening. At ten o'clock at night the policemen were still forming the people in line and admitting them by twos and threes as the persons who had seen the show came out.

The Wichita High School has several hundred disappointed pupils. Last week when they contemplated buying a moving picture machine they found it must be housed in metal booths. A company was going to sell the school the fireproof film machine for $125. The proceeds of the first performance were going to be used to pay for it. Principal Allen of the school thought that they could purchase the machine and that it could be carried from room to room. But that would be impossible for the school would have to build a metal booth in each room for the machine and this they are not able to do just now. It is thought that the machince can be purchased in the near future, however. Many schools in Kansas are now using the moving pictures for educational purposes.

FILM MEN AND EXHIBITORS.

Mutual Help Between Exchange and Exhibitor Important Item in Prosperity of Both.

Special to Moving Picture World by Kansas City News Service.

THE film men in Kansas City are often called upon to advise exhibitors. It is to the advantage of the managers of the exchanges to get the exhibitors started right and to keep them going most profitably. One subject, the most talked about between the film men and exhibitors, is the changing from a five to a ten cent show.

Exchange managers are frank to say that in many cases the increased price can safely be established; it depends entirely upon the location of the show and the prices at which other film exchanges are supplying competitors. If the show is an up-todate picture house and the aristocracy of the neighborhood is not too far decayed and competition of the cut price film services is not too great, the price can be raised. The film managers are very careful to make it plain, however, that the exhibitor must be sure his programs are worth a dime. Patrons will not stand for a five-cent program at a dime admission. It is after the exhibitor has decided to increase the price that the film manager can give him the most valuable advice in arranging a show that shall be worth a dime in that neighborhood, considering the competition.

The closer relations of the managers of the more reliable exchanges with the exhibitors has worked out many puzzling problems to the satisfaction of both. It seems a safe caution to any exhibitor entering the field that he should not neglect to get on these familiar terms with the exchange managers, when those managers are of the right kind.

COST OF STARTING A SHOW.

Conditions Have Changed and Bigger Capital Is Required.

Film men in Kansas City territory are of the opinion that the time when a man can start a picture show house on the small scale is over. It is no longer possible for a man to start in the cigar business in a big city on a small basis and make a success, and so it has become in the moving picture business. It simply means that the gamble has become a little larger. Bigger stakes are played for, because it is usually the case that the exhibitor has to borrow money to start the new business whether he starts little or big. If he fails he is in debt $200 to $500 on a small theater and if he makes good his profits are correspondingly small. If he fails on a large scale he is in debt from $500 to $800, but if he makes good his profits are many times those that the successful operator is enjoying on the smaller scale. The exhibitors are taking these things into consideration and the new theaters that open are being started on the big plan. The public will not patronize the little merchant when they can just as easly patronize the larger one with all the conveniences that modern equipment can give them. It is just the same in the moving picture business as it is in any other line of business. These are the things that most of the film exchange managers are trying to make the exhibitors see and understand.

MISSOURI BRIEFS.

H. E. Jameyson, who travels Kansas territory for the Pathe Exchange, Incorporated, was in the city recently. Mr. Jameyson says that the bookings all through the State are getting better every day and this is because the weather is getting better as well as the roads, and the people can get into town to the theaters. He says that the law in Kansas is going to cause considerable disturbance in exhibitors' circles before long.

"Marty" Williams, manager of the Mutual, has one room of his office attractively decorated with pennants of the Mutual stars. Mr. Williams says that the first of the Mutual Master Pictures, "The Quest," which was shown at the Willis Wood theater last week, proved very successful. The Mutual will release several more Master Pictures within a few days.

L. E. Sheridan, traveler for the Pathe Exchange, was in the city last week. Mr. Sheridan says that he was right there at the Kansas State convention and tried not to mix business with the entertainment, but that so many exhibitors were present that he had bookings literally forced upon him. Mr. Sheridan says that he is out this year to break all records for booking films in Kansas if the law will allow him. At the present time the bookings are running way in advance of those of last year.

Kansas City will soon have the big moving picture, produced by the World Film Corporation, entitled "Your Girl and Mine" or "Votes for Women." It will be shown at several down town theaters just after Easter.

The Electric theater at Joplin, Mo., has increased the price of admission on Saturdays and Sundays. The manager says that this increase is necessary, for everything pertaining to moving pictures and the exhibiting of them has increased.

The Aladdin theater at Springfield, Mo., has had several excellent programs lately. The five-reel feature, "Hearts and Flowers," was put on as an extra attraction. Charles Chaplin in "His New Job" happened to be on the same program. The management aims to give a feature play every few days as an extra atraction. The feature does not decrease the number of pictures shown on the regular program; but is simply added to it.

E. J. Grubel of the Grubel Brothers theater syndicate of Kansas City, Kan., and J. H. Cooper of the same company visited Springfield, Mo., last week. It is said that the reason for the visit was to select just which piece of property which the company holds leases on is the best suited for the erection of a new theater. However, no definite statement was made about the building, which will probably commence soon.

The Electric theater at Bolivar, Mo., recently charged an admission fee of twenty-five cents for the 9 reel production, "The Spoilers." The house was well filled. This is quite a deviation from the regular prices charged at most theaters in small towns.

IN CALIFORNIA.

The Larkin theater, on Larkin street, near O'Farrell, has been reopened under the management of G. A. Smith, formerly of Fort Bragg, Cal., and J. Rothschild, who conducted the house for a short time a few months ago.

A. Toprahanian, formerly manager of the Royal, at Turlock, Cal., was recently here looking for a site for a house, but has since left for Fresno.

The Golden Gate Film Exchange, Inc., has made arrangements to be better represented in the state of Nevada than formerly. The business of the firm will be transacted through a resident representative.

Mr. Jorgensen, of the Pastime, Haight and Fillmore streets, has secured a lease on Green's theater, at San Bruno, Cal.

A. C. Pabst, of the Hub theater, at Mill Valley, Cal., has taken over the management of the Swastika, at Sausalito, and will renovate it throughout.

E. A. Lasher has disposed of the Orpheum, at Susanville, Cal., to E. C. Buckwalter, of the Cosy theater, and the two houses will be consolidated.

Work is under way on a new theater at Woodland, Cal., and this will be opened early in June under the direction of Harry Leland.

The Orpheum, at Alturas, Cal., has been sold by J. F. Slutter to William Burgen, a former Supervisor.

Smith & Benham have leased the Sutter Butte hall at Sutter City, Cal., and will give moving picture shows on Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings at 10 and 15 cents. A Powers Cameragraph No. 6A has been installed.

The Novelty Show Company, of Cloverdale, has purchased the moving picture show conducted at Geyserville, Cal., by E. Nordyke, and will add this house to its circuit in Northern California.

The Curry theater, at Martinez, Cal., has been closed, leaving the field to the new Novelty.

The Crystal, at Grass Valley, Cal., is to be reopened shortly.

The San Jose Film Company is being organized at San Jose, Cal., for the purpose of making educational subjects Melville Jeffrey is general manager.

The Film Club has been incorporated at Santa Barbara, Cal., by William R. Daly, Frank Cooley and eight associates.

The Los Angeles Slide Company has been incorporated at Los Angeles, Cal., with a capital of $10,000, by E. M. Gammon, C. M. Philpott and W. F. Wright.

The Gaiety theater, which has had a stormy time since its opening a year ago, is again giving moving pictures a trial and it would occasion no surprise if this big house would drop musical comedy.

Local Censorship on Coast

California Cities Are Experiencing a Wave of Opinion Favorable to Local Censorship—At Fresno, "Three Weeks" and "Bunk" Comedies Were Stigmatized—Discussion in Other Places—Picture People Plan to Be Heard in the Matter.

By T. A. Church, San Francisco Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

LOCAL censorship of moving pictures is being made an issue in a number of California cities and exhibitors are busily engaged in setting forth reasons why the measures proposed should not be adopted. There is now more of an agitation along this line than there has been for a long time and film men are wondering what has brought such a sudden demand for censorship.

Representatives of the Parlor Lecture Club, Leisure Hour, Wednesday and Friday Clubs, the Y. W. C. A. and W. C. T. U. appeared before the city trustees of Fresno recently and asked that a board of censorship be appointed in the Raisin City for moving picture shows and other amusements. The matter was laid over by the city officials until the next regular meeting in order to give the theater owners a chance to be heard. Miss Ruby Gracier, general secretary of the Y. W. C. A., acted as spokesman and urged the elimination of such pictures as "Three Weeks" and certain kinds of comics which she described as "bunk."

At Grass Valley, Cal., the women composing the various clubs and organizations are taking steps to secure proper moving picture shows for the children of the community. They have agreed that many of the films being shown are not suitable for children and plan to take such steps as are necessary, it is reported, to have only selected films shown.

The City Club of Berkeley, Cal., has been studying the censorship proposition for some time and on the evening of March 25 was sponsor for a public meeting held in the Hotel Shattuck, where both sides of the question was debated. Peter B. Kyne, the Berkeley short story and scenario writer, opposed the censorship idea, saying: "I would be sorry to see an active board of censorship in Berkeley, as censorship in its present meaning is a joke. Censors have no legal power and censorship of an adverse nature only tends to advertise the film which it is wished to suppress. Every knock is a boost in the moving picture industry. The question of morality in moving pictures is largely a question of geography. What would be approved by ministers and mothers in one locality is likely to be condemned in another. Public opinion is becoming the real censor, and as the demand for a higher standard of picture plays grows the need of censors will lessen."

Following the talk of this author, Prof. T. H. Reed, of the University of California, rendered a report of the committee appointed by the City Club to investigate the pictures shown in the eight theaters maintained in Berkeley. Many of the films seen were commended, but the character of many others was ranked low and not one comedy reported upon was given the unanimous approval of the committee. "Children of the Ghetto" was mentioned as a picture of marked distinction and "A Bachelor's Romance" and "The Altar of Love" were called wholesome.

H. L. Beach, of the Strand and Lorin Theaters, of Berkeley, and president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of California, explained the film exchange system and set forth how it was impossible for many exhibitors to pick their programs. His talk cleared up many points not understood by those present.

General Manager C. L. Langley, of the Turner & Dahnken Circus, was to have been present, but was represented by G. E. Thornton, manager of the Oakland House, who told of many cases where the films contracted for at heavy expense were shelved after examination and others substitued, simply to keep up the standard. Following his talk the theater owners and managers were questioned informally regarding many phases of the business and most of those present went away with the conviction that censorship would be a detriment instead of a benefit.

STRICT FIRE RULES GOVERN EXPOSITION SHOWS

Special Licenses Required of Operators —Extra Care Must Be Taken.

The Panama-Pacific International Exposition authorities have taken steps to minimize the danger from fire in the many moving picture theaters operated on the grounds, and have placed in force a number of strict regulations that must be complied with by operators. All operators working on the grounds must pass a satisfactory examination dealing with fire prevention and must have a permit to work there, this being non-transferable. Extra care must be taken with projection machines and film, and operators must show a knowledge of the proper methods of stopping a blaze should one occur. H. Lubfin is a member of the examining board. When all of the theaters are in operation there will be no less than seventy-five free shows on the grounds.

SCREENERS PLAN HIGH JINKS.

The new quarters of the Screen Club, of San Francisco, are rapidly assuming form, and plans are now being made for a formal opening on the evening of April 10. This will take the form of a dance and a varied entertainment for members and their friends, and is being looked forward to with great expectancy. A committee consisting of O. V. Traggardh, Tom North, Joseph Huff and Ralph Marks has already purchased the furnishings and equipment, and the club rooms will be in a completed shape by the date set for the opening. Plans are now being discussed for moving the headquarters of the Film Exchange Board of Trade of San Francisco and the local Exhibitors' League to these quarters, and such a step is generally favored, as it would mean lighter expenses for each organization as well as serve to promote good feeling between exchange men and theater owners.

MAY ENLARGE THE AMERICAN.

The American theater, on Market street, recently opened as a moving picture house by Edwin F. James, of Portland, Ore., has proved to be such a success that plans are now being considered for the construction of a new balcony to increase the seating capacity of the house to 1800. When this work is done stairs will be done away with and inclines installed to make the upper floors more accessible.

OTHER SAN FRANCISCO NOTES.

D. J. Grauman and Ben Michaels, prominent local exhibitors, are interested in the Chinese theater and other Chinese concessions on the Zone at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition.

The California Film Exchange, Inc., has arranged for additional purchases of film and will release fifty-six reels each week in the future.

A. A. Richards, of Modesto, Cal., was a recent visitor here, making arrangements for service. Last fall he disposed of his house in that city, but it has since reverted to him.

The Union Film & Supply Co. has added another member to its traveling staff in the person of F. S. Peachy, formerly with the Mutual Film Corporation.

Tent Show Decision

St. Louis Cannot Prevent Moving Picture Shows from Being Operated in Tents, According to Opinion of Missouri Supreme Court—Interesting History of a Warm Controversy Several Years Old—City Will Ask for a Rehearing.

By A. H. Giebler, St. Louis Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE Missouri Supreme Court, in an opinion handed down March 30th, in Division No. 2, decided that the City of St. Louis could not prevent moving picture shows from being operated in tents. For the last eight years city officials have fought these shows, on the ground of danger from fire.

The controversy started in 1907, when James Smith, then Building Commissioner, ordered such theaters closed. The exhibitors successfully resisted this order and a damage suit against several city officials followed. Efforts were made to have the ordinance amended so as to provide specificially that these shows could not be operated in tents, but the bills were defeated. Then the License Commissioner refused to issue a license and a mandamus suit was filed against him, which Judge Grimm decided in favor of the City.

Under this ruling, in July, 1913, Mayor Kiel summoned all persons having a license to operate a picture show in a tent to show cause why the license should not be revoked. Attorneys Taylor R. Young and Edward W. Foristel, representing the exhibitors, reached an agreement with Mayor Kiel that the order should not be carried out until the matter was passed upon by the courts.

A test case was made. Michael Nash was arrested for operating a tent show and was tried and acquitted in the Court of Criminal Correction, and the City appealed to the Supreme Court.

Judge John C. Brown, who wrote the opinion, holds that a tent does not come within the building restrictions within the "fire limits" of the city, at least not under the ordinance on which the city proceeded against Nash. City Counselor Baird and Assistant Young represented the city, and they will file a motion for a rehearing.

GET CUE FROM PHOTOPLAY.

The Park Players, a local dramatic stock company, while rehearsing the play "Seven Days," for production at the Park theater, witnessed a three-reel photoplay of the same name at the Juniata theater, on Grand and Juniata streets, for "cues" regarding the most effective presentation of their own efforts. The Players and the Park Opera Company divide their time alternately between the Park and Shenandoah. "Seven Days" plays one week at the Park in the west end, then moves to the Shenandoah on the south side the next week.

DRILL AT THE HIPPODROME.

Since Harry M. Earl has taken charge of the Hippodrome, at Sixth and Walnut streets, he has instituted a daily emergency drill. At present the attaches have perfected this drill, and at a given time each day, when the theater is cleared, the "safety first" drill is called for by a signal from Mr. Earl. The employes are instructed in emergency details of every description, and the plan has worked out with wonderful success. Mr. Earl has materially raised the standard of entertainment at the Hippodrome. The program consists of vaudeville and moving pictures.

ST. LOUIS BRIEFS.

The Post-Dispatch, the largest St. Louis daily paper, has added moving picture stories, articles and notes to its columns. On Sunday, March 28th, the magazine section devoted a whole page to Universal City, in California, and another page to the Cincinnati man who found his missing wife through seeing her in a moving picture film.

The Strand, on Sixth near St. Charles street, has changed to an all Paramount feature program, which consists of one feature and one comedy, changed twice a week. This is the only theater in the downtown district showing Paramount pictures. There was some doubt as to whether audiences in the downtown business section would like long features, the idea being prevalent that tired shoppers and business men wanted short reels and short programs. Manager Harry D. Buckley gave the audiences a thorough test with long features before making any contracts, and after a careful study of the attendance and the box office receipts Paramount offerings were put on permanently.

Chas. Schwartz, who manages two theaters, the St. Charles and the Broadway, almost opposite each other on St. Charles street, between Broadway and Sixth street, is distributing a program that gives a week's bill for both of the houses.

The Minusa Cine Products Company has taken possession of the executive offices that have been refitted for the occupancy of the company. The suite is on the sixth floor of the Houser Building, at Sixth and Pine streets.

The Kriterion Film Exchange, which recently opened in St. Louis at 3217 Locust street, is reporting excellent business. J. J. Burke, formerly of Wichita, Kan.; S. S. Sherman and E. N. Woolf, three of the traveling representatives, report many bookings in Missouri, Illinois and Kentucky territory.

Wm. Sievers, manager of the New Grand Central, Grand and Lucas avenues, invited a delegation of about twenty women, members of the Women's Federation of Clubs of the State of Missouri, to a special exhibition of "The Pardon" recently.

The White Way and airdome, a new theater at Sixth and Hickory streets, will be ready for business on April 10th. The house will seat 600 persons, and will be equipped with two projecting machines.

The Majestic, in East St. Louis, was damaged by a fire that broke out in the block in which the theater is situated. The loss to the Majestic is estimated at about $1,000.

The Mutual Film Exchange, 1311 Pine street, has established a special feature department, with Harry Hynes as manager.

POLICE FIND PICTURE OUTFIT.

By A. M. Beatty, Atlanta Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE Macon, Ga., police found a complete moving picture outfit March 26th, on a vacant lot back of the Central Depot, and are now searching for the owner. The outfit consists of five grips, all of which are filled with moving picture equipment.

In one of the grips was found a card bearing the name of Charles Cottingham, civil engineer, and member of the National Geographic Society. On another card was the name of Mrs. Clara Cottingham, Danville, Ill. It is believed the outfit was stolen, then abandoned by the thief

BOY AMATEUR ACTOR HURT.

Pierpont,, the eleven-year-old son of Mrs. W. C. Spiker, of Atlanta, Ga., was assigned the part of the little Belgian boy in the picture which the Bartlett Film Co., of Atlanta, is making for the relief branch of the Belgian Commission in Georgia, with a local talent cast.

A few days ago the camera men and actors, including Pierpont, were taking a scene in front of Grady Hospital; the scenario reached a point where the hungry little Belgian lad stole a loaf of bread—was caught and wept bitterly. As he ran forward, Pierpont stumbled and fell, his arm doubled under his body. At once he was up again, tears streaming down his face.

"Fine, great stuff" shouted the camera man, reeling away. "Some emotion there! The kid's clever!" Pierpont cried until the clicking of the camera stopped. Then he complained of his arm hurting him. He was taken into the hospital, where it was discovered the bone had been broken at the wrist. When complimented by the physicians for his grit and bravery, his reply was "I'm glad I did not spoil the picture."

Columbus, Ga., social and business circles are interested in a motion picture, being taken this week of Columbus. The picture is to be shown there during Homecoming week in April, and will then be placed on one of the motion picture circuits for twenty-six weeks.

Other scenes will include a gathering of Columbus school children, a meeting of 200 Daughters of the Confederacy; a wedding at Trinity Church; a dance at the Hotel Ralston, and a boat-leaving scene at the Columbus wharf, on the Chattahoochee River, where the steamer W. C. Bradley will bear off the wedding party enroute to the Panama Canal. A pretty romance will be woven into the Columbus Picture.

ATLANTA BRIEFS.

"The Black Box" as a drawing card, according to first episode indications, will be the most successful serial yet given to the Atlanta movie fans.

The first performance of moving pictures for Atlanta children was given Saturday at the Grand, the play being "Alice in Wonderland." At a meeting of the Board of Education Thursday, the project was endorsed and the announcement made that the Board would extend a hearty co-operation. Among the plays shortly to be shown are "Uncle Sam in the Treasury" and "The Boy Scouts at Work."

The "Kreutzer Sonata" holds the boards at the Grand the first part of the week, followed by the "Modern Magdalene" and "Return of Perpetua." The Grand is playing to crowded houses under the new management.

Fritzi Scheff in "The Pretty Mrs. Smith" opens the week at The Montgomery, followed by Carlyle Blackwell in "The Last Chapter" and Rita Jolivet in "The Unafraid."

The Mutual Film Corporation announces release of the "Devil" in Atlanta. This is horrifying when we consider the Chapman-Alexander meeting is just closing.

EVERGLADES FILMED.

By Leon Louiso, Jacksonville correspondent Moving Picture World.

A NUMBER of scenes, which will amount to about two thousand feet, of the Florida Everglades have just been taken by T. Potter. Mr. Potter believing that the everglades would be a good subject for a set of pictures contracted with Mackey and Coutant, a Jacksonville firm, to take the scenes. The everglades are known of universally and are a place of mystery to most persons, so few persons having gone up into the glades. Mr. Potter's pictures have promise of being a good money-getter, and of being very interesting. Mr. Leland Coutant of Jacksonville photographed the glades for Mr. Potter. The subject may be used as an educational picture or may be put out as a feature, with a lecturer

Revising Cleveland Code

Commissioner Allen Plans to Correct Foolish Requirements in City's Building Laws—Present Regulation as to Motor Driven Projectors Has Come in for Criticism—Conference with Exhibitors on Permits for Remodeling Theaters.

By J. D. Raridan, Ohio Correspondent of Moving Picture World

DELINQUENCIES in the Cleveland building code, with particular regard to motion picture theaters, will be corrected in a new draft of regulations if V. D. Allen, commissioner of buildings, carries out a plan he has in mind. It has been evident for some months that regulations now in effect are too general to properly cover picture houses. As a result it is contemplated to specify a code which will have a particular bearing on construction and remodelling theaters.

Since amendments of 1911 the regulations tend to discriminate against the use of motors in the operating booth. It was constructed to read that houses erected before the amendment are allowed to use motors and all erected after that time cannot use them. An amicable understanding was reached by the building department and moving picture exhibitors, however.

Certain theaters, erected before 1911, have for some time sought permits for reconstruction and to remodel but have been unsuccessful by reason of the fact that the building department was forced to observe the code. Mr. Allen conferred recently with exhibitors and gave it his opinion that picture theaters are handicapped and should have some remedy in amendments.

WARREN PICTURE THEATERS OPEN AGAIN SUNDAY

Several Arrests on Sunday Blue Laws Charge—People with Exhibitors.

Residents of Warren, O., suburban to Cleveland, were stirred to high pitch recently in a dispute that racked the entire town on the feasibility of "blue laws." Managers of four picture theaters were placed under arrest for running shows on Sunday. Prosecutor Archer L. Phelps declared the arrests were made because the managers and their employes performed "common labor" on Sunday.

In spite of the warning that the "blue laws" must be observed the managers last Sunday kept their theaters open, permitting patrons to enter free of charge, in a move to test the law. At Niles, nearest town to Warren, the theaters are open on Sunday unmolested. Houses in Cleveland, Cincinnati, Toledo and elsewhere over the state give Sunday shows and no attempt has been made to exert closing laws.

The state law reads: "Sabbath desecration, Chapter 12, Section 13,044, of the Ohio General Code—Whoever, being over fourteen years of age, engaged in common labor or opens or causes to be open a building or place for the transaction of business, or requires a person in his employ or under his control to engage in common labor on Sunday, on complaint made within ten days thereafter, shall be fined $25, and for each subsequent offense, shall be fined not less than $50, nor more than $100, and imprisonment not less than five days nor more than thirty days."

Those arrested included Manager W. W. Dunnavent, Dreamland theater; R. L. Hawkins, Crescent theater; James A. Reeves, Duchess theater and John J. Murray, Opera House. Employes who were taken in charge by the minions of the law included: Mrs. John J. Murray, Mrs. Hattie Wheeler, Mrs. Inez Coe, Frank Andrews, John Shore, Nick Mascio, Chas. Gaither, Charles Wannamaker and Robert Wieder.

The arrests were treated somewhat as a sensation by all Warren. When news of the "raid" spread a large crowd appeared before each of the theaters Manager Murray made a speech before he was led away, closing with this remark: "More than 2,000 persons have signed a petition that the picture houses be opened on Sunday. We thought we were obeying the public demand for clean amusement on Sunday."

"We're with you John" came a chorus of shouts from the crowd as he passed. Popular opinion in Warren is that picture show operation should be left to a vote of the citizens and the managers agree they would be willing to abide by such decision.

OHIO SHORTER ITEMS.

C. G. Thompson, manager of the Victor Film Service, distributor of Universal productions, returned early last week from Universal City, Cal., imbued with enthusiasm for this model film city, its citizens and their work.

Since the United Film Service, distributing a regular program of daily and weekly feature productions, established its exchange in Cleveland with Walter M. Williams as manager in charge of the territory, exhibitors and patrons of picture shows have benefited alike. The United maintains a suite of offices on the second floor of the Columbia building.

Lorain is to have a winter garden, as the Majectic is to be converted into a place of amusement of that kind. L. C. Hoover and Gus Schroeder, of Cleveland, have secured the playhouse on a long lease. They will make changes in the interior of the house, and have announced that their policy will be to run high-class photoplays exclusively.

The front of the Colonial, Ashland, will be remodeled and new furnishings will be installed. The Princess, in the same town, has put in a new steel ceiling and made other improvements.

Manager Gebhart, of the Grand, Ashland, has put in an attractively arranged box, which accommodates eight persons. It is located in the rear of the theater and on an elevation above the rest of the seats. A Wurlitzer musical instrument, which plays twenty selections without change, has been added to the equipment of the house.

T. J. Powell, veteran theater man, has bought the Gem, Sandusky, from H. C. Mills. Mr. Powell has been located at Lorain, and he has announced that he will remodel the house. Mr. Mills and his wife will retire from the picture theater field for a rest, but are expectd to get back into the show business in the fall.

Manager O. L. Taylor, of the Majestic, Lancaster, announces that he will retain that theater, but is seeking a buyer for the Orpheum theater, at Nelsonville.

The Bellefontaine High School has purchased a projecting machine that will be used in the class rooms as a teaching aid. It has been found that the pupils absorb knowledge better from watching screens than by the usual methods of study. Botany is one of the subjects that readily can be taught by the showing of pictures.

The Sidney High School has just installed a projecting machine, while the Bucyrus High School has been using one with great success.

Proceeds of the show at the North Side theater, Bryan, on Friday night, March 26, were turned over to the baseball club representing that city. The money will be used in buying uniforms and as a nucleus for the expense fund to keep the nine on the diamond.

Mackenzie Pictures

Life in Baffin's Island Pictured in Six Reels of Film—First Showing at Convocation Hall, University of Toronto—Sir William Mackenzie's Expedition Has Been in North Two Years—Films of Great Scientific Value.

By David K. Billings, Toronto Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

SIX THOUSAND FEET of film illustrating the life of the Eskimo and of animal and physical life in the arctic regions of Baffin's Island, was shown for the first time in Convocation Hall, University of Toronto, last Tuesday night. The pictures were taken by the Sir William Mackenzie expedition which returned from the northern regions this winter. They are conceded by those that have seen them to be the most complete and extensive pictures of their kind ever taken. The exhibition last Tuesday, which was free of charge, was accompanied by an address of explanation by R. J. Flaherty, F. R. G. S., who, along with E. E. LaDuke, had charge of the expedition.

An Arctic Studio.

The party left two years ago for the north and took with them some 25,000 feet of film, all of which was exposed during the stay. The principal purpose of the expedition was to obtain pictures and many hazardous ventures were made, especially while taking pictures of natural phenomena. Every foot of the film was developed and much was exposed at the camp headquarters on Baffin's Island, which for two years was the most northerly picture studio in the world. The films were brought to Toronto in entirety where they were edited down to the 6,000 feet that will be shown to the public. It is intended to show the pictures before the National Geographic Society and before numerous American scientific and research associations.

One of the most interesting reels shows pictures taken on the newly rediscovered islands in the Hudson's Bay. These islands, which had been lost to students of geography, were thoroughly filmed by the first white men to set foot on them for over 100 years.

The party carried several Pathe cameras with them and also a complete outfit for preparing the films. One of the best anthropological films ever taken showing the life of the eskimos in its every phase and of incalculable scientific value is the result of this latest venture. Mr. Flaherty in his address stated that the pictures obtained were the most vivid illustration of the scientific possibilities of the moving picture.

CONNESS-TILL'S SPEEDY WORK.

What was probably a Canadian record for fast production of a picture was made by the Conness-Till Film Company this week when they filmed the maneouvers held by the second contingent Canadian Expeditionary Force. The sham battle which was held on Wednesday lasted the entire day and on Thursday morning 2,000 feet of film showing every phase of the fighting was exhibited at the Photodrome. The photography and assembling of the picture was superb and created a big sensation both in public and press.

TORONTO SHORTER ITEMS.

One feature a week has been the slogan of the Conness-Till Company in their Made-in-Canada campaign which is creating considerable interest. The releases of the company have been steadily maintained with the addition of several topical films, and it looks as if those who predicted a hasty death for the first Canadian picture concern will be disappointed.

General business conditions in Ontario are improving with the advent of Spring, and it looks as if this revival will reflect on the moving picture business. There seems to be an increased demand for high-class features, while the craze for patriotic and war dramas has abated somewhat.

Gus Kahn has been appointed publicity manager of the Canadian office of the World Film Corporation and has started his duties.

COHNS MAY BUILD BIG THEATER IN INDIANAPOLIS

Have Option on Property for 3,500-Seat Theater—May Build Soon.

Special to M. P. W. for Indiana Trade News Service.

SAMUEL L. COHN of San Francisco and Morris Cohn of Denver, have taken a thirty days option on property in the center of Indianapolis on the opposite side of the Circle from the English Opera House. They announce they will erect a moving picture theater that will be large and elaborate, and represent an outlay of $200,000.

The piece of real estate upon which they hold an option is irregular in shape and will give them exits on three different streets. The plans contemplate thirty-five exits and the Cohns say the house can be emptied of its crowd in thirty seconds. A seating capacity of 3,500 is planned. A two-hour show is planned with prices ranging from 5 to 15 cents. In addition to the pictures there will be an orchestra of thirty-five pieces and a pipe organ that he estimates will cost $20,000. An air washing and ventilating system is planned. The lighting will be indirect. A feature will be a smoking room for men and a rest room for women.

The house will be of concrete and steel and fireproof throughout. The Cohns own six big houses, the latest of which was built in Denver. All are successful houses, according to the Cohns, who are backing their judgment against Indianapolis pessimists, as they call them, who say the town will not support such a house.

ELKHART SUNDAY SHOWS.

As a result of the acquittal of Clifford Cole, Elkhart, Indiana, manager of the Orpheum, charged with operating on Sunday, the proprietors of Elkhart houses have agreed on a board of censorship to consist of the mayor prosecuting attorney, editors of the local papers and other competent persons. The board will pass upon all productions.

It is expected that the Law and Order League of Elkhart will take steps to bring the alleged Sunday violations up before the grand jury for investigation.

The first "wide open" Sunday at the Elkhart theaters brought out a good attendance, but not so good, exhibitors are certain, as will be the rule after the feeling that exists in some quarters has died away. Following the step in Elkhart, the exhibitors of Goshen, the Elkhart twin city, will open on Sunday. It is probable they may experience some trouble, but inasmuch as any case that may be brought will be tried in the same court that tried the Elkhart case, the exhibitors feel sure they are safe.

A GOOD STUNT OF SMALL TOWN.

Alex Cornutt, manager of the Westport, Westport, Ind., put on a stunt for All Fools Day. Hand bills were distributed in Westport several days in advance sugesting that everybody come to the show April 1 dressed as some picture character. There were several John Bunnies, Broncho Billies, Slippery Slims and Mustang Petes, not overlooking two rivals of Mary Pickford and one of Flora Finch. The stunt should be good for some small town exhibitor to make note of as a good feature for next Hallowe'en.

INDIANA BRIEFS.

M. L. Stewart of Brazil, formerly proprietor of the Family theater, was robbed of feature films valued at $1,200. Mr. Stewart has been travelling from city to city showing the feature film "Cleopatra," and had stored the production in the rear of the theater at Eighth and Hulman streets, Terre Haute.

The Colonial, under the management of Bingham, Crose and Cohen, is to be opened after Easter with a feature picture program. The Colonial was originally built for vaudeville, but failed to catch the multitude.

Clyde Willard, Greenburg, Ind., sold his interest in the Westport theater, Westport, Ind., to his partner, Alex Cornut. Mr. Willard is now entirely out of the business, having recently sold his interest in a Greensburg theater.

James Alcorn, who now owns all the theaters in Greensburg, Ind., has announced his purpose to run them all as five-cent houses.

John W. Minor, deputy state fire marshal, recently issued an order to operators in Richmond, Ind., prohibiting the use of pipe, cigarettes or cigars in machine booths. The fact that the operators had been smoking without serious results, he said, might make them careless.

None of the witnesses against Roscoe Heimbaugh, operator at Jeffersonville, Ind., charged with violating the Sunday law, appeared when the case was called, and a postponement was granted by the court. No definite date for the next hearing has been set.

Joseph Schmal of Chicago, will put on stock and pictures at the Logansport, Ind., Broadway theater. The house is being redecorated and finished inside and out for the opening the middle of April.

Thieves stole a 600-pound motion picture machine from a freight car in the Grand Trunk yards at South Bend, Ind. There is no clew.

Samuel L. Cohn, promotor of the new $200,000 house to be built in Indianapolis, says that a mistake was made to connect him with a Denver theater. He has no house in Denver, he says, his interests being in San Francisco.

J. C. Hunter, of the North American Film Co., will have charge of the new serial, "The Diamond from the Sky," for Indiana and Kentucky. Mr. Hunter's headquarters will be in the office of the Mutual Film Company in Indianapolis.

F. J. Rembush, Shelbyville, has bought the Dream Theater at Martinsville of the Switou Amusement Co.

Philip Scora, manager, has reopened the Wells Bijou, Evansville, as a movie house, using a Mutual master release four days a week. The house has been running as a legitimate theater.

Mutual feature master releases will be run by the Lyric, Indianapolis, beginning at once.

The Grand Opera House, Terre Haute, is now running tabloid shows with Mutual Guy G. Williams succeeds Chester Keller as manager of the Orpheum theater, Lafayette, Ind. Mr. Williams used to be in charge of the La Purdette theater in Lafayette.

Majestic Theatre Opens

Detroit's New Picture House, at Woodward and Willis Avenues, Opened on Thursday, April 1—Seats 2,160 Persons—Manager M. D. McGee Is in Charge —Short Description of the Building That Is Considered a Credit to the City.

By Jacob Smith, Detroit Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE important event of the week was the official opening of the new Majestic theater, Woodward and Willis avenues, which took place Thursday evening, April 1. That there was a large crowd on hand when the doors opened goes without saying, despite the fact that it was Holy Thursday of the Lenten season. The Majestic occupies a plot of ground 120 by 175 feet, and the auditorium is patterned after a Roman amphitheatre, all the seats being placed on one gradual incline. Boxes line each side and extend across the center of the building, and there are seats for exactly 2,160 persons. Decorations are in the Adam style; the color scheme is ivory, gold and old rose with carpets, seats and all furnishings in harmony. There is not a post in the theater, the stage is large enough for road shows and a washed air system for heating or cooling has been installed. The features for the opening night were "The Woman Who Dared" and "The Beetle Dancer." Also a musical program by a large orchestra and the pipe organ, and vocal soloists. The programs will be changed four times a week, Sunday, Monday, Wednesday and Friday. The Majestic is under the management of M. W. McGee, formerly of New York City. It is operated by the Majestic Theater Company, of which A. Arthur Caille is president. Space will not permit at this time to describe all the features of this beautiful new playhouse, but at a later date we will have such an article, illustrated with photographs. Suffice it to say that the Majestic is a credit to Detroit, to its builders and to the moving picture industry. It certainly shows that the industry has advanced by comparing the Majestic with playhouses built five years ago.

WON'T WASTE MONEY ON USELESS CENSORSHIP

Detroit Committee on Parks Has No Funds to Throw Away on Local Censors.

Although a strong attempt was made by the recreation commission of Detroit to get the committee on parks and boulevards to grant them an allowance for use in censoring moving pictures, their efforts in that direction were unsuccessful. The committee slashed the item, saying that money spent for such a purpose would be like wasting it. The committee felt that the work of the National Board of Censors was sufficient evidence that a film was fit to be shown. Commissioner of Police John Gillespie now states that none of his men will be permitted to censor pictures except where the department receives a complaint, and then, of course, the film in question will be investigated.

GIVES UP ITS OFFICE.

The Pathescope Sales Company has abandoned its office in the Dime Bank building and the business for this State is now handled from the mezzanine balcony of Heynz Bazaar, Woodward avenue department store. Mr. Evans, formerly with the Pathescope Sales Company, is now with Heyns, looking after this particular department. The balcony has been completely equipped for screening all film. Francis Reno, formerly manager of the Pathescope for this territory, has formed the Artone Film Company, associated with him being W. H. Goodfellow and Gus Froebel. This company will produce pictures and is now working on plans for a studio.

DETROIT SHORTER ITEMS.

A. W. Blankmeyer, of the Grand Circus theater, Detroit, returned March 31 from a week's visit to New York, where he went to negotiate with producers in behalf of the Michigan Theaters Corporation, which, as announced last week, consists of owners of moving picture theaters who have organized for the purpose of buying their film direct instead of through film exchanges.

M. Harlan Starr, manager of the Washington theater, has returned from New York and Philadelphia, where he was sent by John H. Kunsky to view "The Eternal City" and "The Birth of a Nation," both of which have been secured by Mr. Kunsky. Mr. Starr said both productions were the greatest of their kind he had ever witnessed. "The Eternal City" appeared at the Washington the week of April 4.

Ushers in the Theater Comique on Pingree Square, prevented a possible panic on March 25 when the roof of the theater caught fire a half hour before the theater closed for the day. The ushers went through the aisles assuring those in the audience that there was no danger, and admonishing them to take their time and leave quietly. The damage was a very slight one.

LYNCHBURG NEWS ITEMS.

By Julian T. Baber, Lynchburg Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

IN opening up the Academy of Music on April 5th, S. H. Jolliffe, of Bluefield, W. Va., who recently leased the theater for five years, inaugurated a new policy by presenting a vaudeville program, with incidental motion pictures, as a means of stimulating the interest of an amusement-loving public which has not had a chance to see vaudeville for several months. Mr. Jolliffe has charge of theaters also in Roanoke and Bluefield and it is understood that he is figuring on landing two other houses before his plans are completed. The Academy of Music in this city will be in charge of Ollie A. Savin and John M. Joliffe, the lessee's son, will act as treasurer.

A baseball team composed of the managers and operators of motion picture theaters in this city was recently organized and arrangements are being made to schedule games with a number of strong local amateur teams. Owing to the hours which the "movie" men have to work, games cannot be played except in the forenoon, and on this account considerable difficulty is being experienced securing games with organizations that are eager at this time to get in practice for the coming season. Guy Barret, of the Belvedere, is an infielder, whose training was secured on the sandlots of Washington. Floyd Goodrich, of the Universal, is known to have a good record as a catcher, and John Sanderson, of the Gayety, has made a name for himself as a pitcher in local amateur circles. Others have shown class in practice.

Manager Floyd Goodrich, of the Universal Theater, has succeeded in prevailing upon The News, Lynchburg's only morning daily newspaper, to run the "Black Box" serial story each week.

Julian T. Baber, special correspondent for The Moving Picture World, submitted the winning scenario in the contest recently conducted under the auspices of the Universal Theater. The title of his picture was "The Newspaper Guy" and the cast will be composed of local people and the author will portray the role of the reporter. The contest attracted not a little interest and Manager Goodrich expects that this feature will crowd his theater during the three days that the picture is exhibited.

Picture Offends Negroes

In Portland, Maine, Colored People Are Making Protest Against "The Nigger," a Picture from Sheldon's Play—Was Shown at the Keith Theater—Expect Other Pictures That Excite Race Prejudice—Manager Thinks the Film Praises Negroes.

By John P. Flannagan, Maine Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

A STRONG protest was made by the negroes of Portland during the past week on the production of "The Nigger" by the Keith theater but to no avail as the management of the house showed the film each day as advertised.

Rev. W. H. Lamar, a negro minister, voiced the sentiments of the negroes in stating his objections to Mayor Ingraham against the film. He urged that some measures be taken against further productions of the play in Portland and the possibilities of later presentation of such plays as "The Leopard's Spots," "The Clansman," and "The Klu Klux Klan," which might follow "The Nigger" at the local theater. He said that "The Nigger" is objectionable from a race standpoint and serves to awaken the feeling between the black and white races that northern members of both for years have been trying to eliminate. While Rev. Mr. Lamar stated that there are few specific lines or situations throughout the play that could be brought to mind as derogatory to the negro, the entire trend of the drama, from its title to the final act, gives the opinion of an endeavor to make false comparisons.

The manager of the theater answered that there has been no intention to offend the colored people or any one else. He believes as do others that the play is laudatory to the negroes.

PORTLAND THEATERS VISITED BY ORDINANCE COMMITTEE.

Were Petitioned to Regulate Picture Houses and Wanted to See for Themselves.

In order that they might see the theaters in actual operation during the rush hours, members of the ordinance committee of Portland City Government visited several pla es of entertainment last week following their executive session in City Hall. The session was held relative to a hearing on a petition asking for regulation of theaters for the protection of the public. No action has yet been taken.

The legislative committee of the Civic Club reported on the subject of the ordinance regarding safety in theaters now before the city government, that in a general way the club should endorse all measures for safety, especially the provision requiring that the rear passageways should be kept clear at all times. The committee, however, felt that some of the provisions in this proposed city ordinance are of a somewhat radical character and it was recommended that care be taken to find out what other cities are doing along those lines before fully endorsing all of the ideas contained in the proposed ordinance.

ROLFE PLAYERS IN PORTLAND.

The Rolfe Photo Play Company of New York City, under the direction of Edward Middleton, is in Portland for a ten days stay at the Congress Square hotel. Mr. Middleton is putting on a dramatized version and skillful adaption of George Gibbs' recently popular success, "The Flaming Sword." Most of the action of the play is supposed to take place on the Island of Saint Martin, off the Canadian coast. Maine scenery, however, is proving a very acceptable substitute and the Rolfe Company is now snapping some of its biggest scenes in the immediate vicinity of Portland.

Although the weather on the Maine coast has been showing itself as exceptionally cold and windy for this season of the year, yet the moving picture artists are ever upon the alert and have already begun to migrate down east in steadily increasing numbers. Their keenly worked out and cleverly acted productions only serve to exploit and call further attention to the extensive natural beauties of our Pine Tree scenery and to make the old State even better known than it is now to the remaining sections of the country.

THE PARK THEATER.

The largest building east of Portland, Maine, erected exclusively for moving pictures is the Park theater, in Bangor, described not long ago in this paper. It seats 1,250 people on one floor. The Park has been charging 10 cents admission in the evening, and five cents in the afternoon, but, commencing on Easter Monday, April 5, the Paramount service, which has been at the Bijou, will be transferred to the Park, and the admission for adults will be ten cents at all performances, children five cents. Paramount pictures will be shown Mondays, Tuesday, Fridays and Saturdays at the Park, and the World Film Corporation specials on Wednesdays and Thursdays.

For the next three weeks the Bijou, which is the Keith vaudeville house in Bangor, will have a stock company on the boards, and will be without pictures for several weeks, then resuming with Metro program and Box Office attractions. The program in both houses being supplemented by General Film regular service. Up to the present, the Park has been using World Film Corporation service exclusively.

MAINE BRIEFS.

James W. Greeley, manager of the Greeley theater of Portland, is in New York to arrange for the installment of a Wurlitzer unit orchestra in his playhouse.

One of the most important circuits in Maine is the Washington County circuit of the World Film Corporation. Starting at the Strand, Ellsworth, the big attractions of this company work every large town in that section of the state. By means of shipping from town to town, the films are worked every day.

Earl B. Tinker, of Ellsworth, Me., who handles Maine, New Hampshire and Vermont for the World Film Corporation, reports that they are working to full capacity and that on service known as Class "A" he is able to supply the demand.

The Keith at Portland has started a prize contest and will give a diamond lavaliere and a solid gold wrist watch to the most popular and the next most popular woman or girl in Portland and suburbs.

Manager Charles M. Stern, of the Universal Film Exchange, returned this week from a business trip to Rumford, Lewiston and Boston. He reports that business will doubtless be much better in the near future.

A. J. Pine, general manager of the Majectic, at Rumford, will reopen on April 12. His theater has been closed during Lent.

Norman Merrill, of Yarmouth, has for the second time begun to enlarge his theater. At present he is running twice a week, but will open on May 1 every night in the week.

W. L. Pitman, manager of the Opera House in Fairfield, also proprietor of a house in Monmouth, has started Universal service in the latter house.

FILMS FAR FROM RAILROADS.

Interesting Account of Theaters in Little Sage Brush Villages.

By H. W. Pickering, Salt Lake Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

MANY managers from remote parts of the state are taking advantage of the railroad rates to Salt Lake City (granted to accommodate the large crowds that attend the semi-annual conference of the Mormon church) to visit the various film exchanges in this city and make bookings for the summer season.

The journeyings of Utah managers from the corners of the state to the capital are a bit remarkable when it is considered that many of them are operating houses—all prosperous—in little, out-of-the-way mountain towns, some of them hundreds of miles from a railroad. A traveler on fast trains from the east could reach Salt Lake City from New York in the same time that it takes persons to reach this city from some of the counties down in the southern part of the state. Which throws an interesting light on the motion picture business in this state. Some of the managers have not even seen the exchange men, except as they make the long trip by train and stage coach "visiting the trade," and most of the country town impresarios have not seen the home offices of the exchanges.

In spite of their isolation, however, the little motion picture theaters in mining towns and little desert settlements in the heart of immense reclamation projects are showing the highest class of films. Some of them have regular bookings of the larger feature productions and the photographic images of the stars are as well known to their patrons as to "city folks," though they have, in many cases, been carted across miles of sage-brush flats. The exchange men in Salt Lake are in the capital of one of the largest and most difficult territories in the country, but seem to have registered success in planting their best films in practically every hamlet in the thinly-settled states of the intermountain region.

SALT LAKE CITY BRIEFS.

During the past few weeks, Salt Lake has had a pleasurable epidemic of travelogues and "war pictures." First came Roberson's travelogues at the Liberty theater, under auspices of the Herald-Republican, and drew large audiences. Then appeared Dr. A. Gideon at the Salt Lake theater last week with his European War travelogue and the latest announcement on the billboards is that of the Salt Lake Tribune's war pictures, which will be shown next week at the Salt Lake theater.

A new photoplay theater is being built in Pocatello, Ida., to have a seating capacity of 800, at the corner of Fourth avenue and Center street. The builder and owner is R. M. Green and the house will be operated by William Lloyd, who has a string of motion picture houses in southern Idaho.

C. G. Purrington recently obtained control of both motion picture theaters in American Fork, Utah—the Orient and the Young Men's Hall. Both theaters have just been remodeled. The attractions at the Orient and Young Men's Hall are booked through the Notable Feature, General Film, Fox and World exchanges in Salt Lake.

In addition to vaudeville, Manager Horne shows motion pictures four days of the week at the New Lyric in Logan, Utah.

Harvey Johnson has made a "go" of the Rex theater in Logan. This house was established as a nickel theater several months ago and a "coroner's jury," consisting of every one in Logan, passed on the project and predicted a dark blue fizzle for Mr. Johnson and his associates. The house has recently been enlarged and remodeled for an expected rush of summer business.

"THE BIRTH OF A NATION" TO OPEN IN BOSTON.

Expected Protest Realized—Mayor Curley Petitioned—What Parkhurst Says.

"The Birth of a Nation" will open its Boston engagement at the Tremont theater on Saturday afternoon, April 10, for an indefinite period.

As soon as this announcement was made public, several prominent Bostonians, including Francis J. Garrison and the Rev. Horace Bumstead, signed resolutions, which were sent to Mayor Curley, asking that the exhibition of the photoplay be prohibited.

The following is the communication received by Mayor Curley from the association:

My Dear Sir: At a meeting of the board of directors of Boston branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the enclosed resolution was unanimously adopted requesting a hearing for the purpose of opposing the production of "The Birth of a Nation" in Boston. And I respectfully request that such a hearing be granted at some early date prior to April 10, 1915.

Very Respectfully,
Butler Wilson, Secretary.

Whereas, it is announced in the public press that "The Birth of a Nation" is to be produced at the Tremont theater in Boston, beginning April 10, 1915, and

Whereas, the film should not be shown in Boston,

First, because it is a libel upon and an insult to a large number of Boston citizens.

Second, because it engenders race hatred.

Third, because it tends to a breach of the public peace.

Resolved, that the executive committee of the Boston branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People respectfully request the Hon. James M. Curley, mayor of Boston, to grant us a public hearing at an early date, prior to April 10, 1915, for the purpose of producing the evidence and showing the reasons why the film should not be shown in Boston.

The following resolution was also passed:

Resolved, that we earnestly protest against the exhibition in the moving picture theaters of Boston and vicinity of Thomas Dixon's play, "The Birth of a Nation." This play, like some previous literary and dramatic productions of the author, being a gross and demoralizing misrepresentation of the colored population of our country, untrue in fact, cruel in spirit, fruitful of race prejudice, demoralizing to whites and blacks alike, and dangerous to the public welfare. We appeal to the mayors of Boston and neighboring cities, and to all others in authority to use every power entrusted to them to suppress this vicious play.

Mayor Curley has received a letter from the Rev. Charles H. Parkhurst of New York City, regarding the production, which read in part:

"The criticism that it exhibits the negro in an unfortunate light and that it is calculated to engender racial animosity is fully met by the consideration that it represents the negro, not as he is now at all, but as he was in the days when he had just had the chains broken from him and when he was rioting in the deliciousness of a liberty so new and untried that he had not yet learned to understand it and was as ignorant as a baby of the way to use it.

"It is in this respect exactly true to history and if it reflects upon the negro as he was then, it is a compliment to the black man of to-day. An exhibition of negro lawlessness might not have been proper thirty or forty years ago. Such proprieties, however, change with the passing of time."

Crowd to Hear Debate

Massachusetts State Senate Galleries Thronged by Representatives of Women's Societies Actively Interested in Furthering Carstens Bill for State Censorship —Expected to Hear Debate—Indignant When Postponement Is Carried.

By Edwin McCloskey, New England Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

MOVING picture censorship was one of the principal topics under discussion in the Massachusetts State Senate last Friday afternoon, when Senator Sanford Bates of Boston moved to substitute for an adverse report the Carstens censorship bill, which provides that the State Board of Labor and Industries have jurisdiction over all films to be exhibited in the state.

At the present time there is no censorship of films in the Bay State. The State Police, however, review and pass on all pictures to be exhibited on Sundays. The Carstens bill provides for the appointment of three or more censors, who shall be appointed by the Board of Labor and Industries. It also provides that they shall stamp their approval on every film and that a fee of one dollar shall be charged for every reel passed.

The galleries of the Senate Chamber were filled with women who are interested in the state supervision of moving pictures. Most of these women represent women's organizations throughout the state. At a recent hearing on the bill, over five hundred women appeared before the committee and stated that after an investigation of seven weeks, they thought that for the protection of the growing generation state censorship was a necessity.

After hearing the pros and cons on the question, the joint legislative committee on Mercantile Affairs reported that the bill should be referred to the next General Court for consideration. This committee report came up in the Senate last week and attracted a number of women.

When the matter was reached on the calendar, Senator Bates, who presented the bill at the petition of Carl Carstens, special agent for the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, moved to substitute the bill for the adverse committee report. Senator James Timulty of Boston asked for an explanation of the situation, and before Senator Bates could reply, Senator Hays of Boston moved for a postponement.

Senators Bates and Ellis argued against such action on the part of the Senate and their speeches brought forth considerable applause from the many women assembled in the gallery, but President Collidge rapped sharply with his gavel and the hand clapping promptly was stopped.

After the motion to postpone was carried by a vote of sixteen to seven, the interested spectators withdrew from the Chamber. The women expressed great indignation at their treatment by the Senate. They said that the Senators had informed them that the bill regarding motion picture censorship would be debated upon at that meeting.

Relying on this assurance, representatives of the various clubs, some of them coming from great distances, went to the State House to hear the discussion. Several uncomplimentary remarks were passed in the corridors about Senators who voted in favor of postponement. ment.

FIRE COMMISSIONER ISSUES NEW FILM STORAGE RULES.

Regulations Are Drastic, But Generally Considered as Well Chosen.

Fire Prevention Commissioner O'Keefe has issued new regulations regarding the storage, keeping and handling of inflammable motion picture films and the construction and maintenance of buildings in connection therewith. These regulations supersede the regulations of the district police so far as the Metropolitan district is concerned, and in a degree are more drastic, but as the result of months of study and investigation, are generally regarded as reasonable. The three principal features of the new regulations are:

First—Each reel or part of reel must be kept in a separate metal box, with tightly fitting cover, and after Jan. 1, 1916, in galvanized iron boxes approved by the commissioner.

Second—These boxes must be kept in fireproof vaults, ventilated at floor and roof.

Third—The number of films to be exposed at any one time is limited to ten in any one room, and films in transit must be in incombustible containers, each not to contain more than eight reels.

NEW VERNON AT WORCESTER.

The new Vernon theater in Vernon square, Worcester, will be opened on April 19 by Samuel Kumin, who has arranged with Manager Fred B. Murphy for the use of United Film Service. This house, which has a seating capacity of 700, was built at a cost of $65,000 and will be managed by John F. Moden, one of the original moving picture lecturers and formerly manager of Keith's theater, Campello, Mass. Two new Powers 6A machines have been installed. Every modern convenience has been installed. A large marquis is extended over the sidewalk and is valued at $8,000. The lobby is of marble and the theater is regarded by all as one of the most beautiful in this section.

FILMS FOR FARMERS.

At the personal request of his old acquaintance, Governor David I. Walsh of Massachusetts, Manager Edward J. Farrell of the General Film Company exhibited three reels of film, which were taken for the forestry and agricultural boards of Massachusetts. The pictures show the different farming lands of the state and the methods used by different planters in cultivating their land. The governor was unable to be present at the runoff, on account of state business. The pictures are most instructing and show the farmers how to fight forest fires and the best means of fire prevention.

NEW ENGLAND BRIEFS.

The Magic theater, East Boston, has been sold by William Dowling to Hyman Alexander, one of the first exhibitors in New England. Mr. Alexander opened the first moving picture theater in Cambridge, Mass., some years ago. Of late he has been in Canada, but recently returned to Boston.

Prominent Jewish women in and around Boston have arranged for a motion picture performance to be given in the Majestic theater, Boston, on the evening of April 11. The proceeds will be devoted to the relief of the employed and poor at home. The pictures will be donated by the Olympia theaters, Inc. The executive committee comprises Mrs. Jessie Abrahams, chairman; Mrs. Harry Liebmann, vice chairman; Mrs. Felix Voernberg, Mrs. Nathan H. Gordon, Mrs. J. Ackerman, Mrs. E. Van Noorden, Mrs. Isaac K. E. Prager and Mrs. J. P. Morris.

Several of the Boston friends of James P. Kincaid, manager of the Olympia theater, Gloucester, Mass., were present when "Jim" was initiated in to the Gloucester Lodge of Elks last week.

Manager J. A. Eslow of the New England Universal Film Exchange has returned to his desk after a trip to the Panama-Pacific Exposition and Universal City.

Bars Prize Fight Films

Federal Regulation Will Prohibit Introduction of Willard-Johnson Fight Pictures Entering Country Through Customs Offices—Action Will Rest on Division of Customs of Which Assistant Secretary Andrew J. Peters Is in Charge.

By Clarence L. Linz, Washington Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

SHOULD an effort be made to bring into this country motion pictures depicting the prize fight between Jack Johnson and Willard, in Havana on April 5, the promotors will be sadly disappointed, for they will face a federal regulation which prohibits the importation of all fight pictures. In view of the fact that this is the first prize fight of note since the enactment of the law of which the taking of motion pictures was contemplated, considerable interest is being shown as to what action the government would take. The law gives such censorship powers to the Secretary of the Treasury and action would rest with the Division of Customs of which Assistant Secretary Andrew J. Peters is in charge. When inquiry was made at the Treasury Department by the Washington correspondent of the Moving Picture World, attention was invited to the section of the customs regulations providing for the admission into this country of photographic films which provides for the exclusion of "undesirable" pictures of all kinds. It is not believed that the film or films would get by the customs inspectors at the port of entry.

VETERANS WILL SEE FILMS.

Harry Crandall, operating Crandall's theater; Sydney B. Lust, manager of the United Film Service office; Herbert M. Osborn, manager of the local Pathe Exchange, and Clarence L. Linz, representing the Moving Picture World, have been appointed members of the Citizens' Committee of One Hundred which is to have in charge the arrangements for the fiftieth annual encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic to be held in this city the last week in September. It is said that this will be the last encampment to be held by the old soldiers and it is planned to have this one form the greatest event in the history of the city and second only to the inaugural celebrations. President Wilson and the members of his Cabinet have accepted honorary membership, and the names of the city's most prominent financial and commercial men appear on the various committee lists. In selecting the above-mentioned members of the moving picture industry in Washington, William F. Gude, who heads the committee, has conferred upon them a signal honor.

For the purpose of properly entertaining the old soldiers a fund of $25,000 has already been subscribed, and before adjourning Congress appropriated a large sum of money to be expended for their comfort. Their headquarters are to be located in the Old Census Building. It is contemplated giving a large exhibition of motion pictures showing our troops at target practice, and also of the troops of foreign countries as contained in the reels of commercial companies.

ANNETTE THORN MANAGING RAPHAEL THEATER.

Miss Annette Thorn has assumed the active management of the Raphael theater, at Ninth and O streets, Northwest. The theater is operated by her and her brother, Oscar Thorn, but its management has until recently been in the hands of others. Not meeting with desired results, they started to handle the proposition themselves, but Mr. Thorn was stricken with pneumonia and all responsibilities fell upon his sister. Miss Thorn is an attractive young woman who seems to know pretty well just what her patrons want in the way of motion pictures and the five hundred seats at the Raphael are pretty well occupied at all exhibitions. Miss Thorn reports increasing business and seems to have but slightly felt the Lenten inactivity. This is a five cent house with ten cent shows on Sundays and Wednesdays. The theater presents a very attractive appearance and shows that considerable interest is being taken in it by its owners.

SCHOOLS WIN PATHESCOPES.

Award has been made by the Washington Post of ten Pathescopes to that number of winning schools in the recently completed prize-voting contest and two of these schools have also been awarded a free film service for three months. Interest in the contest has been very great and the winning schools each had several hundred thousand votes cast in their favor. The installation of motion picture outfits in the public schools for the benefit of pupils and their parents is welcomed by the exhibitors as a whole. Such exhibitions will not enter into competition with commercially conducted shows for the reason that they will be devoted to educational and travel films for which there is little demand in the theaters. On the other hand it will serve to foster a desire for films of an entertaining nature and thus the business of the theaters will be increased.

CRANDALL'S PROGRAM.

At Crandall's during a two days' showing of the Passion Play last week a quartet of trained voices sang appropriate songs to the accompaniment of organ music. Regardless of the cry for religious subjects, it does not seem as though the church-going public will support such exhibitions and Mr. Crandall found it necessary to supplement these reels with "A Jitney Elopement," featuring "Charlie" Chaplin. This latter is now the most popular "comedy artist" screened in Washington and an announcement that a Chaplin reel is to be shown is sufficient to fill any theater to capacity. But it is an extremely hard matter to show a religious subject and a slap-stick comedy on the same bill. The offensiveness of such a program was overcome by Mr. Crandall, who used a short scenic between the two and one of the weeklies in closing the show. Before the scenic was completed, the audience had forgotten that they had been looking at so serious a play as that named, and were ready for the comedy which in turn was forgotten by the exhibition of the war pictures. Mr. Crandall handled his predicament in a most appropriate manner, for without the aid of Mr. Chaplin he would without a doubt have lost money—for it was the latter who made the two days' business of record-breaking volume.

WASHINGTON BRIEFS.

Castelberry, who for the past few years has been managing the Elite in Rome, Ga., and who is well known throughout that state, has taken over the management of the new Broadway, of the Piedmont Amusement Company, in Danville, Va. W. R. Wilkerson, manager of the Piedmont theater, in Greensboro, N. C., is now in full charge of the booking of the features used on the entire circuit of the Piedmont Amusement Company.

A new Amusu has been opened in Henderson, N. C., by B. J. Elmont. The house is a very attractive one and is under the management of J. W. White, an old-time exhibitor of the South.

J. E. Cosment, of the Fairfax theater, in Culpepper, Va., was a visitor in Washington last week.

Charles Sommers, of the Dixie theater, Richmond, Va., while in Washington last week booked "Chaplin" pictures.

Other visitors were Billie Airey, of the Apollo, Martinsburg, W. Va., formerly of this city, Jack Levy and Earl Booth, of the Fox Film Corporation's Philadelphia office, and Mr. Levine, of the Little Pickwick, of Baltimore, Md.

Harry W. Watkins has assumed the management of the Casino on G, near Seventh street, Northwest. This house runs vaudeville as well as motion pictures.

The United Film Service is soon to take possession of the new quarters on B street, near Ninth street, Northwest, now being remodeled to meet the requirements of the film business. Although having a lease to the entire building, the concern will occupy the two upper stories only. On the first of these will be the offices, sales department, shipping department and display room, while on the upper floor will be the projection room which is to be fitted up as a miniature theater that the exhibitors may view films before booking. Here also will be the poster room. The present quarters on Ninth street have been outgrown and Mr. Sidney B. Lust, the manager for this territory, has found himself badly cramped for room.

Mr. Irvine, formerly manager of the Regent, and for several years manager of the Virginia theater, is now occupying a similar position at the New American, on Rhode Island avenue.

MAYOR BEHRMAN HOSPITABLE TO PICTURE MAKERS

Is Delighted to Have Studios in New Orleans—Says City Has Advantages.

By Trade News Moving Picture World New Orleans Correspondent.

MAYOR Martin Behrman, interviewed on the stand of the City Park Commission with regard to its newly announced policy of censoring scenes staged there, dictated the following signed statement for the World. It will be noted that he does not touch upon the park commission incident, he feeling that this is no proper part of an official statement coming from him. It was suggested during the source of the interview that a number of large picture corporations, the Selig-Polyscope among them, were looking towards New Orleans for studio sites and it was chiefly to reassure such corporations that he issued the statement, which follows:

"I not only heartily approve, but am delighted with this opportunity to welcome the establishment of moving picture studios in New Orleans. I know of no city in America that offers greater inducements for this character of enterprise than does this city, and none where the enterprise itself is more likely to be attended by advantages so thoroughly mutual.

"Apart from the fact that conditions here are especially adaptable to the making of moving pictures, climatic and otherwise, there is an atmosphere about New Orleans, and particularly about "the old quarter" that is decidedly inviting, giving to the work of the operator an interest as unique and romantic as it is practical and up to date.

"(Signed) MARTIN BEHRMAN,
"Mayor."

All but two of the New Orleans exchanges were represented and it is expected that these also will be present at the meeting of organization.

Organization in Montreal

Montreal Picture Men Have Decided to Bury Differences and Have Formed an Association—Meeting Called to Consider Unpopular Cent Charity Tax Resulted in the New Organization—Former Association Succumbed.

By Gerald Gallagher, Montreal Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

MONTREAL exhibitors have awakened to the fact that organization is the only method by which an endurable state of affairs can be attained in the local moving picture trade. At a meeting held on Tuesday evening, March 30th, at the Strand theater, it was decided to make some preparations towards the establishment of a strong organization. A goodly number of managers had assembled for the purpose of deciding what steps would be taken in regard to the one-cent charity tax. It was then proposed that an association be formed and officers were elected. R. W. Herring, manager of the Mount Royal, was elected president; Geo. Nicholas, manager of the Strand, vice-president; Mr. Sperdakos, manager of the Fairyland, secretary. The Executive Committee consists of Messrs. Rosenbury, Fortier, Thomas, Blatter, Montisana. In this last case it was decided to have members of the Committee represent all nationalities engaged in the exhibition of moving pictures in Montreal.

Interviewed as to the aims of the association, Mr. Herring, the president, stated: "Laws and regulations against moving pictures in Montreal are singularly severe and unjust. This state of affairs may be attributed to two causes: an ignorance on the part of legislators as to the true conditions of the film industry, and an apathy and indifference on the part of exhibitors to doing what is right in the way of organization. Affairs had reached such a crisis that the only solution was organization. This is more difficult to be obtained in Montreal than anywhere else. I regret to say, but it is generally admitted, that rivalry among exhibitors is too far-fetched. There are so many races engaged in the business, and such a distrust of the opposition, that it was a delicate matter to cope with. Our first campaign will be directed against the charity tax. My policy is to try and point out to those exhibitors in need of such advice that there is plenty of room for all in the business without any severe business tactics. We must be one big brotherhood. We must either all agree upon this, or matters will reach such a state that whatever privileges we may be now enjoying will be rescinded by ill-informed legislators. Briefly, our policy is to achieve harmony, not only with the authorities, but in the ranks of the trade."

The actions of the exhibitors, as well as the statements of their spokesman, are to be commended. Although there are some malcontents in Montreal, it is indisputable that an organization was needed. Things had reached a crisis. Joint action was the only solution. We hope the Association will live long. It must not die, like the old one, because of broken pledges. The issue at stake is too great to permit any bickering or quarrels.

MONTREAL NOTES.

Douglas Cooper, of the Douglas Cooper Film Exchange, Toronto, Ont., handling Kleine films, was in town recently on business. He expressed himself as pleased with conditions in the Queen City.

Maurice West, manager of the Family theater, devoted the proceeds of his theater on Thursday evening, April 8th, towards the expenses of Ed. Fabre, the local French-Canadian Olympic runner, while the latter competes at Boston in the big classic to be held in the Hub shortly.

"Damon and Pythias," the five-reel Universal spectacle produced by Otis Turner, was screened for three days recently at the Strand. It played to big business.

The offices of the Allied Features, Ltd., in the New Birks Bldg., have been renovated and laid out in a manner such as to cope with the big increase in business.

A Wurlitzer orchestrion equivalent to a twenty-seven piece orchestra has been installed in the New Grand here, at a cost of $5,000.

L. E. Conness, Preident and General Manager of the Conness-Till Moving Picture Company, of Toronto, Ont., was in town recently in the interests of the firm. "Canada in Peace and War," a three-reeler produced by this Canadian company, was shown here at the Strand recently.

The Commercial Motion Picture Co. has been formed in Montreal, and has opened offices in the New Birks' Building. The directors of the company are Messrs. Lapierre and Foster, and its aim is to make a specialty of commercial work.

Warner's Features, Ltd., will be known in the future as the United Film Service of Canada, Ltd. Mr. A. H. Fischer, local manager, claims that the new program is surpassing all expectations.

Recent features at local houses were: Edison's "A Theft in the Dark," Imperial; Paramount's "The Morals of Marcus," "Domino; Essanay's "Stars Their Courses Change," Colonial; Keystone's "That Little Band of Gold," Strand; World Film's "M'liss," Fairyland; Paramount's "The Goose Girl," New Grand; Universal's "Mary's Duke," London; Thanhauser's "The Duel in the Dark," Tivoli; Universal's "Valois' Reward," Mount Royal.

S. Gilson recently returned from a trip through Eastern Ontario where he had been boosting the Picture Playhouse brand. Business is fair, he claims, in the small towns.

Recent visitors in Ottawa, Ont., were: Harry Kaufman, Famous Players, Montreal; Les. Kaufman, Allfeatures, Toronto; Maurice Kaufman, World Films, Toronto; A. H. Fischer, United Film Service, Montreal; H. Lubin, Allied, Montreal; Geo. Rotsky, Mutual, Montreal; Tom Byerle, General, Montreal; S. Gilson, Picture Playhouse, Montreal. It happened that all the above gentlemen were in the Capital on the same day. We have it that Ottawa is doing the best business in Canada just now.

A new theater has been opened in Ottawa, Ont., on Rideau street. It is called the Princess, cost about $25,000, and is managed by I. Sugarman.

The Strand, Ottawa, Ont., is now under the management of Mr. Cardell.

A new theater has been opened in Perth, Ont., called the Opera House. It cost about $25,000.

Mr. McDonald, proprietor of the Wonderland theater, Cornwall, Ont., has enlarged his house by making it seventy-five feet deeper.

The Grand theater, Pembroke, Ont., has changed its policy to one of five acts of vaudeville and big features.

The Royal theater, Hawkesburg, Ont., managed by Mr. Priest, has closed down.

A new theater called the Family has been opened in Arnprior, Ont.

A report from Winnipeg, Man., says that the Provincial treasurer has introduced a bill in the Legislature giving the Government power to levy a tax of twenty cents for each seat in any theater for which a license is necessary, a tax of $100 on dancing pavilions, and $200 on film exchanges. The theater tax includes moving picture houses.

A new theater is being erected in Quebec City. It will cost about $30,000, and will have a seating capacity of 800. Business in the Ancient City fell off quite a bit during Lent.

The Princess theater, at Smith Falls, Ont., is reported to have closed. Mr. Delaney, its manager, is now looking after his other house in Gananoque.

VITAGRAPH.

THE TAMING OF RITA (April 19).—She is an irrepressible tomboy, but for all that a very sweet and lovable girl. Her brother, Frank, loves the little hoyden dearly and always takes her part against her mother and aristocratic big sister, Laura, who both despair of her ever becoming the sedate and proper little miss they would have her. Frank invites Leslie Gray, just returned from a trip round the world, to their home for a week-end. When mother and Laura hear of this, it is at once decided—despite Frank's protests—that Rita would be very much de trop. She is banished to the country. The fact is sister Laura fears that Rita might prove more attractive to the young man than herself. Rita doesn't care, however, and enjoys herself heartily at the little country place. No sooner does she spy a sign in another lot reading, "No trespassing," than she gets over the fence and proceeds to explore. The crabbed old owner sends his farm-hand to drive her off, but the young man loses his heart to her on the spot. A charming love affair is soon in progress, although Rita feels she can never forgive him for literally smoking her out of one of the forbidden trees. About this time, mother sends for Rita to come home, for Frank has received word his friend is ill. Rita goes—reluctantly. Several days later, the wealthy young man arrives on his postponed visit and he proves to be the "farm hand." Mother is horrified, and words cannot describe Laura's feelings. Rita pretends anger, but Leslie simply follows her to her favorite perch in the branches of the old apple tree, and when she proves obdurate to all his coaxing, he threatens to "smoke her out" again. She then laughingly comes down, and incidentally, into his arms. They go back to the house, and when they announce their desire to get married, mother, after the first shock, consoles herself with the thought that Rita has made the "catch of the season," but Laura———! ! !

THE CLOSING OF THE CIRCUIT (Special—Two parts—April 20).—Brought up by his father in total ignorance of his blindness and the fact that other people can see with their eyes, while he sees only with his ten fingers and that wonderful inner consciousness of the nearness of objects which the blind possess, Paul's awakening to a knowledge of his infirmity causes him the keener anguish. It develops through a meeting with Mary, a young girl neighbor, who, with the ruthlessness of youth, convinces the boy he is blind. Filled with pity for his helplessness, she kisses Paul tenderly. The memory of Mary and the kiss remains with him, and he one day climbs the garden wall and trudges forth alone, to find her. Strangers understand little the boy says, except the words, "ship" and "Mary." They accordingly guide him to where the sailing ship, "The Mary Croft," is docked, supposing the lad has wandered away from the boat. Stumbling aboard, Paul falls into an open hatchway onto the "tween deck" below and is not discovered until the vessel sails. Then he learns why the "Mary Croft" is noted among sailors as a "man-killer." The rough crew in the fo'c'stle come to believe the boy is faking blindness because of his wonderful ability to move about, and his life is made miserable. During a terrific storm Paul, with several others, is sent aloft to the very top of the mainmast, and while there the "Mary Croft" is struck by lightning. Clinging to the swaying yard-arm, the boy finds, to his utter bewilderment, that he can see with his eyes. The lightning stroke has jarred the optic nerve into life. The mast, weakened by the fire, is snapped off by the tremendous force of the wind and flung into the sea. Paul manages to regain hold of the spar and is later picked up by the "Franklyn," on which are his father and Mary. The meeting between the boy and girl is touching in the extreme, for he finds, as he gazes at her in reverent adoration, that she is even more beautiful than he had supposed.

THE GUTTERSNIPE (April 21).—Living in the hope that the lost treasure chart of the Van Nuys family will some day be found, old Peter Van Nuys hangs onto their old mansion, although he is really too poor to keep it up. His blind son, Victor, lives with him, and is kept in ignorance of their real poverty by little subterfuges on the part of his father. Peter's nephew, Edgar, is the only visitor, and after reading the ancient parchment stating their ancestors buried a treasure on—but here the parchment is torn and the chart missing—Edgar tries to get the old man to sell the place to him. Peter refuses. Then Edgar goes to Victor and cruelly disillusions the son in regard to their real financial condition, hoping he will persuade his father to sell. Meanwhile Peter steals out, unnoticed, to sell some of his precious books so they will have enough to eat. He meets "The Guttersnipe," a ragged, selfish little creature, homeless and dirty, but bewitchingly pretty. He saves her from the just wrath of an Italian fruit peddler and she follows Peter home. Unable to turn the homeless waif away, he takes her in and gives her a home. The Guttersnipe exhibits her gratitude in peculiar ways, but her heart is pure gold and all become greatly attached to her. She and Victor fall in love, and one day she throws a book at Edgar to repel his undesirable advances, and from its leaves out falls the chart. Edgar manages to ruin the chart, after noting the directions, but that night the Guttersnipe surprises Edgar in the act of making away with the treasure box. Her cries bring the neighbors, and Edgar is hustled away to jail, while the Van Nuys discover a double treasure, a box full of jewels and in the heart of the little Guttersnipe Victor finds a treasure of love.

SONNY JIM AND THE VALENTINE (April 22).—No sooner have Sonny Jim and his little comrade, Dick Gray, noticed the beautiful big valentine in the window of Miss Tabitha's little candy store near their school, than both determine to purchase it for little Esther Anne, whose long yellow curls and haughty manner they have long secretly admired. Daddy Jim gives him the money to buy it, but teacher finds him counting it over in school hours and takes half of it away from him as a punishment for inattention. When he goes to Miss Tabitha's shop for the valentine it is gone, and he feels angry. On his way out Sonny overhears a big gruff man intimidating little Miss Tabitha and demanding she close up or pay him the money owing him. Sonny bravely offers his fourteen cents, which are refused with a sneer. Miss Tabitha helps the little boy choose a much smaller valentine for Esther, but one better suited to his present finances. He and Dick, while mailing their valentines, get into a scrap. Result: both boys come home with scratched faces and many bruises, each saying, "You ought to have seen the other fellow." After dinner Sonny tells what transpired in the candy store, asking Daddy "What does 'close up' mean?" Daddy tells him and both visit some of the other papas in the neighborhood, who, like Daddy Jim, have known the candy shop lady since they were boys. A handsome sum of money is gotten together, then all go to Miss Tabitha's store and deliver it to her as a "Valentine." Next day, according to instructions, the little lady opens the envelope, and her heart is filled with gladness when she sees the checks with the tender messages from her "big boys and little boys." Sonny's heart is also made glad when Esther, despite the size of Dick's valentine, plainly shows that her preference is for Sonny, causing Dick to write Sonny a note to the effect that "girls is queer, anyway."

WHOSE HUSBAND? (April 23).—Captain Scruggins, a retired sea captain, is married to Kate, a strong-minded, strong-armed woman, who rules him with a rod of iron and is continually comparing him unfavorably with her late departed husband, James Smith. Captain Sniffen and his wife, Flora, neighbors of the Scruggins, are just the opposite. She is a weak, weepy little woman, while he is a great burly brute with a continual grouch. Her forever reminding him how little he is like her dear first husband who went down with the Nancy Lee twenty years ago does not soothe him any. Jake, an escaped convict, finds a bottle on the seashore, inside of which is a photograph, an address and a note, saying that the writer, J. Smith, is about to perish in a watery grave and bequeaths his money and property to his wife. Finding he somewhat resembles the man in the photograph, the convict decides to impersonate him and claim the estate. He accordingly goes to the Scruggins home and introduces himself as the supposedly dead first husband of Kate. Kate faints, and to Jake's wonderment, Scruggins merely thanks him for coming back to life. Kate does not prove obstreperous with Jake, however, and the convict is soon very much at home. When the Sniffens drop in the convict learns to his horror that Flora Sniffen is the one to whom J. Smith left all his property. Jake is only temporarily baffled, for he announces that his enfeebled mind has again played him false—that Flora is his wife. Kate rejoices, but Captain Sniffen makes trouble for Jake. The convict throws him out of the house, so Sniffen, in revenge, fetches the village constable, who recognizes the escaped convict and drags him off to jail. The happy outcome of it all is that the two married couples realize life is too short to quarrel, and they make up.

PAWNS OF MARS (Broadway Star Feature—Three parts—Special—April 24).—Conducting experiments with a new explosive of tremendous power, Dr. Lefone, a celebrated chemist, receives a visit from Rizo Turbal, secretly acting as spy for the emperor of a foreign country. Lefone's friend, John Temple, is experimenting with a discovery he has made of a new wireless wave, with which he expects to explode bombs at long range. The Secretary of War becomes interested in Lefone, and as a war crisis is at hand, preparations are made for a practical demonstration of Lefone's new explosive as soon as it is ready. During the chemist's absence Florence wanders into the laboratory and upsetting some chemicals, an explosion takes place which blinds her. Lefone is heartbroken and only his daughter's entreaties induce him to carry on the work. The experiment completed, Lefone makes up several bombs, each the size of a pigeon's egg, and taking two of them, starts for the secret meeting place. Rizo and another spy witness the tests from in hiding and are amazed at the fearful destructive power of the little bombs. Rizo rushes back to Lefone's laboratory and because of Florence's blindness, manages to steal the remaining bombs, delivering them in triumph to his emperor. The Secretary of War then sends for John and by his orders the wireless apparatus—now completed—is set up near the probable field of battle. Rizo, by the emperor's orders, mounts into an aeroplane and soars up into the sky toward the Secretary of War's camp. He drops one of the bombs on an armored motor truck and blows it to atoms, but John gets his apparatus working just as Rizo drops bombs onto a large body of infantry. On coming in contact with the wireless rays the missles explode harmlessly in mid air. Finally John gets the range of the aeroplane itself, and the machine, with its occupants, is literally torn to bits when the rays strike the remaining bombs. The danger over, John takes his blind sweetheart in his arms, saddened at the realization that they are but the Pawns of Mars.

him. The artist refuses to allow her to take their child, but places it in an institution. Wallace is commissioned to paint a Madonna for the new cathedral. For a long time he searches in vain for a suitable model. Jane, pursued by a policeman who had seen her in the act of snatching a handbag, takes refuge in the grounds of the institution where Wallace has placed his baby. The infant's nurse places the child down for a few minutes. To throw her pursuers off the track, Jane picks the baby up and pretends to be its nurse.

Wallace comes to see his child. He discovers it in Jane's arms. In the girl the man finds the very type he has been looking for. Wallace learns of Jane's ruse. By threatening to turn her over to the police, he induces the woman to pose for him. As the painting develops, Wallace discovers that he is inspired.

The marvelous picture has a curious effect the baseness of the lives they had been leading. Wallace finds that he loves Jane. She, however, has learned of the misery he has caused his wife. Her better nature aroused by the painting, Jane induces Wallace to seek Edna out. The model goes to the institution which houses the artist's baby and succeeds in securing a position as nurse. Wallace finds his wife—but too late. The woman dies just before he reaches her side. Remorse-stricken, he vows to devote all his time to his child. Wallace hastens to the institution for his baby. He finds her in Jane's arms.

LOTTA COIN'S GHOST (April 20).—Inspired by the thought of Lotta Coin's wonderful billion dollar necklace, Ham and Bud turn burglars in an effort to annex it. On the night of the intended burglarizing expedition, the cracksmen peer through the window and see Lotta placing the jewel in the safe. Later, Ham and Bud enter. After placing a can of powder under the safe and lighting the fuse, Ham orders Bud to sit on the safe and keep it down when the explosion occurs. Wadda Coin, aroused by the noise, enters the room. Ham indignantly requests him to stay away until the safe is destroyed.

This happens a minute later. The explosion drapes Bud over the chandelier, knocks Wadda Coin behind the table, and blows Ham out of the room. Returning, Ham rescues Bud and the two enter the pantry. There they get into a fight. Coin enters just in time to be hit with a cup thrown by Ham. The man falls unconscious. Lotta is awakened by the rumpus. She resolves to frighten the burglars by disguising as a ghost. Ham gives one look upon the ghastly figure and flees, followed by Bud. The race leads through a back yard where Bud becomes entangled in a bed sheet hanging on a line. Ham, glancing back, sees the sheet-clad figure. Believing it to be the ghost, he proceeds to break all speed records.

An extra spurt enables Bud to overtake his pal. Ham drops to his knees in fear and trembling and awaits his fate. Bud gets rid of the sheet. The moment Ham discovers the "ghost's" identity, he rises and goes after Bud. The latter doesn't attempt to argue—he just runs.

MIKE DONEGAL'S ESCAPE (Episode No. 13 of "The Girl Detective" Series—April 21).—How did Mike Donegal escape from prison? Utterly at sea, Warden Craven sends for Jean and Talcott, her new assistant. Jean speedily becomes convinced that Donegal is still in the building. While Talcott converses with Craven, she makes a tour of the prison. In going through the room adjoining the fire-room, Jean stumbles over a man who is bound and gagged.

Without pausing to loosen the man's bonds, the Girl Detective enters the fire room. One glance at the fireman's face and she turns to give the alarm. Donegal, however, seizes Jean and throttles her into insensibility. In the meantime, the real fireman has worked his bonds loose. He enters the fire room just as Donegal is about to thrust his victim into the furnace. The fireman shouts for help. Craven, Talcott and a number of guards respond to the call. Donegal is overpowered and tells how he escaped from his cell.

Jeffries, Donegal's pal, had climbed to the roof of the building. After locating the cell, Jeffries lowered a piece of joist into it, via the venthole. Placing the piece of wood in his bed and covering it with the blanket, Donegal hid undereath the bunk. When the guard entered the cell and discovered that the prisoner had apparently disappeared, he promptly rushed out to notify Craven, leaving the door open. Knowing the other prisoners would never "squeal," Donegal left his hiding place and went to the fire room. There he overpowered the man on watch and changed clothes with him. But for Jean's suspicions, he would have made his escape when relieved by the fireman of the next shift.

WILLIE WHIPPLE'S DREAM (April 23).—Mrs. Whipple is the boss of the Whipple home. Consequetly, when she orders her husband to go over and lick Mr. Fossil because she has had a quarrel with Mrs. Fossil, Willie obeys. But when Willie lays eyes on Fossil, he changes his mind about fighting him. Instead, he and Fossil have a drink together. While in the cafe, Willie sees an umbrella that catches his fancy. Appropriating it, he leaves the place.

Willie is about to enter his home when he catches Mrs. Fossil's eye. A flirtation promptly ensues. Proceeding over to the Fossil residence, Willie enters. The fickle woman, angered by his boldness, knocks him down. Mrs. Whipple sees her husband go into the Fossil home. Wild with jealousy, she hastens over and enters just as Mrs. Fossil knocks Willie flat. At the same time, Fossil and the owner of the umbrella enter the house bent on capturing the culprit. The latter receives a blow which knocks him senseless.

While unconscious, Willie dreams that he and Mrs. Fossil are eloping. But try as they will, Mrs. Whipple miraculously appears as often as they endeavor to spoon. Willie dreams that his wife finally seizes him and throws him into a lake. Just then he wakes up. Every person in the room is dousing him with water. Half-drowned, the poor man tries to get up on his feet. But this makes matters worse because Mrs. Whipple starts pummeling him.

A RACE FOR A CROSSING Episode No. 24 of the "Hazards of Helen" Railroad Series—April 24).—Helen is informed that her road is to make a trial run which will decide whether it is to land the mail contract. Sharky, the rival road's agent, plots to spoil the run and land the contract for his own road. One of Sharky's men opens a waste valve on the tank of the engine hauling the mail special. When near Lone Point, the water tank runs dry. To run back to the nearest water would mean a fatal delay.

Helen has an inspiration. Commandeering the new gasoline speeder used by Billy, a lineman, the operator orders the mail clerk to place his bags on the little car. This done, she and Billy make a wild dash for Elwood Junction, where the Limited has been ordered to wait. The plotters are disconcerted by Helen's upsetting of their scheme. Climbing into an auto they endeavor to beat the gasoline speeder to the Lima drawbridge. In her desire to beat the auto Helen drives the speeder over Hobart Crossing barely in time to escape being run down by an express train which passes an instant later.

The plotters reach the drawbridge a few minutes ahead of Helen. The girl sees the bridge lifting. Scenting deviltry, Helen picks up a track gang and takes them to the bridge. There they have a hand-to-hand battle with Sharky's crew, while Helen lowers the bridge. This done, the girl rushes her car across. She barely reaches the structure when Sharky raises it again. Helen's car rushes down the track like a shot and she reaches the Junction in time to save the contract. Sharky and his gang are later captured.

ESSANAY.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SILENT DEATH (April 19).—Within less than five months after the mysterious death of her mother, Adene Maintland wakes in the early morning to learn that her father has also died silently and mysteriously. She suspects her step-father, Wainwright. A glance at her mother's will, which she has obtained from her lawyer and which is made out in Wainwright's favor, increases her suspicions and she confides them to her friend Lewis Courtland. He tells her to be careful about accusation and undertakes the investigation. Under cover of darkness, one night, he meets Adene on the front porch of the house of mystery and goes to her room while she silently transfers herself to another room. He falls asleep and is awakened with the sense of suffocation. Gas is escaping through the fireplace. It is carbon monoxide. Courtland steals down stairs and discovers Wainwright in the act of making it. He turns him over to the police.

THE SNOW-BURNER (Special—Three parts—April 20).—"Hell Camp" Rievers, boss of a logging camp is rejected by Helen Pearson. Later he finds that she is desperately in need of a position, through the illness of her father, he tricks her into taking a place as bookkeeper at the camp. Rievers, an unscrupulous character, plots to get her into his power. "Toppy" Treplin, a wealthy young man, slightly dissipated, arrives at the camp at the same time as Miss Pearson. He at once divines Rivers' intention, and decides to stay and protect her. He takes a job as a blacksmith's helper.

"Tilly," a half breed, whom Rievers has wronged and now has ordered from the camp, tells Treplin that Rievers is planning harm to Miss Pearson after she, the Indian girl, is out of the way. "Toppy" faces Rievers and the two men have a terrific battle in which "Toppy" is victor. Rievers later goes to Miss Pearson's quarters, where "Toppy" follows him. Rievers surprises "Toppy" and seizes

A Man and

Book AT ONCE

The Sky Pilot—The Road Agent—The Dancing Girl—and a "Skunk"

Miracles DO happen.

I have just experienced one—I have lived a miracle.

For one hour, while sitting in a comfortable chair in our little private theatre, my sight, my feelings, my emotions, my whole being has really lived through tense dramatic moments in the lives of men and women two thousand miles away from where I sat.

And the miracle was that I, the spectator, was also an actor in that wonderful Master-Picture—that I had loved, hated, schemed, triumphed with the characters as they played their parts before my eyes.

And, as the last scene of "On the Night Stage" faded, I realized that I and the millions of good folks who see our Master-Pictures do live in an age of miracles.

For one hour I had lived in Arizona.

The hot blue sky, nature's tumbled mountains, the color, the glare, the throb of the pitiless sun in the wild blood of man, the human scenes riotous with action—the best and the worst in us at war—with the love of a woman to sway the balance—but, I'm telling too much . . . . . .

You shall see and live this miracle as I saw and lived it—you will forget my enthusiasm in your own.

How you'll love it—if you've any of the boy left in you. And most of us have, praise be!

This is

ON THE NIGHT STAGE. It is the seventh of the Mutual Master-Pictures I promised you.

It was made by the New York Motion Picture Company under Mr. Thomas Ince's personal direction, and will be shown soon in a theatre near your home.

Were You Ever on the Spot when They Started to Lynch the Wrong Man?

When the picture flashes the ruggedness and blunt strength of the Golden West on the screen I seem to feel I'm booked for action — big, thrilling, red-blooded action—and a climax to satisfy the hungriest moving picture fan in the country.

That's what you get all the way through the four-reel Reliance production of

A MAN AND HIS MATE.

If you know the story—or if you have seen the play—you know what a vital, gripping subject it is.

But you haven't seen it lived.

That's it—it's alive, terribly, wonderfully alive!

There is nothing more sinister than a mob bent upon the destruction of some human life, but when you know that the blood-thirsty crowd is going to lynch the wrong man, you just want to shout, to force your way through the throng, to fight to save him . . . . . .

Here I am, getting too enthusiastic — but the humanity of this picture gets me again, even as I write—and it will get you.

There's a climax to this story, a climax to "A Man and His Mate" that makes you glad you're a man—for what greater thing is there in all the world than to lay down your life for the woman you love?

Yes—these are two great moving pictures. You can see them sooner if you will him by the throat. He is choking the life out of him when Helen shoots him in the arm. The loggers, who admire and respect "Toppy" and hate Rievers, are aroused to madness. They pursue Rievers, who takes refuge in a cave and stands at bay with his revolver. One of the workmen hurls a stick of dynamite into the cave blowing the rock to pieces. "Toppy" tells Miss Pearson he is going to buy the camp and asks her to stay as his wife. She consents.

THE FABLE OF THE TWO UNFETTERED BIRDS (April 21).—Edgar and Laura were two High-Brows. They agreed to be intellectual Comrades. The Friendship between them was not even Platonic. It was about as romantic as a cold Hot Water Bag. Laura had her own apartment, where she was surrounded by books and an air of refinement and everything to make her happy. Edgar had three rooms with a bath, which he called Independence Hall, because no women or kids were there to interfere with his liberties. But both of them slipped a little. They got interested in babies. If you are a Superior Person, don't have anything to do with a baby. They learned where there was a grand one without parents. They took it to Laura's place, where the landlady had a spotless reputation and conducted a nice place. When she discovered a strange baby on the premises, she began to ask questions. They had to marry to form a close corporation.

DONE IN WAX (April 22).—Once upon a time a professor ordered the wax figure of King Woof, a celebrated eastern potentate who had died from eating too much pomegranate juice and who had a reputation for making history. The professor noised it abroad that he had secured the figure at an enormous expense. Everybody was crazy to see it. But it caught on fire on shipboard and the professor was up against it. Now just as he was figuring on how to get out of his hard luck, a hobo wandered in and the professor pressed him into service with the promise of ten beans. He dressed the 'bo like King Woof and set him on a pedestal. Business was poor, however, and he sold the kink to a restaurant keeper. The figure was the middle piece of a fountain and looked so life-like that the guest caught ft eating food. The restauranteur got wise and nailed the "kink" in a box and threw him into the lake.

THE CONSPIRACY AT THE CHATEAU (April 24).—Young Hugh Thormly of Chicago, a candidate for states attorney, incurs the enmity of Martin Hobart, a political boss when he refuses to resign his candidacy. Shortly after his refusal he goes to the Thormly country home which has been modeled after the old French Chateau de Montsigny and which is located above the straits of Mackinac, Northern Michigan. When he arrives there, he discovers a beautiful girl to be living there. He does not tell her he finds anything strange in her presence. She tells him that this is her home. Hobart, who had seen him leave the city and who has followed him, peers in the window and sees Hugh alone with the girl and the servant. He confronts Hugh and tells him that he will publish the story of the affair if Hugh does not promise to resign. Hugh resents the insult and the two men fight with rapiers that happen to be hanging in the room. Jacques, an old servant, stops the fighting and confesses that the girl is really a daughter of the family who owned the famous French estate. The family had been despoiled in the Franco-Prussian war and had fled to Canada. When the girl's father, the Duc, died, he made Jacques promise to restore the girl to his inheritance. When Mr. Thormly had this place modeled after the old French family home. Jacques determines to take the chance and take possession. He brings the girl, Virginie, from the convent and tells her this is his home. At the conclusion of his story, Virginia comes in dressed in her mother's dress. Hobart begs her pardon and tells Hugh his opposition is withdrawn. Hugh declares his love for the girl.

THE FACE AT THE CURTAIN (April 16).—The Man, down on his luck, breaks into the home of a wealthy clubman to burglarize the place. The sudden dropping of a book which the man has displaced, arouses the wife who has been sitting up waiting for her husband. Ignorant of the fact that there is a burglar in the house, she telephones her husband at the club and asks him to come home. He refuses to do so until he is ready. When he arrives home, he is intoxicated. Her refusal to kiss him sends him into a drunken rage. He mistreats her. The Man has watched the whole domestic tragedy. He rescues the wife but while she is thanking him, the husband gets the "drop" on him and calls the police. The wife tells him that if the man is arrested she will say he is her friend. The husband then comes to a realization of what he has done and begs forgiveness. The man puts back the things he stole and goes out.

ROAD O' STRIFE No. 3—"The Silver Cup"—(April 19).—But a short time has elapsed since Alene first came from the old house in which she grew to womanhood, but already her keen mind is sensing the true basis of certain conventionalities, and when Martha, Dr. Duncan's wife, suggests that she exchange her Grecian robe for more modern garments, the girl agrees after asking "Will Robert Dane like me better?" Already there is creeping into Alene's manner toward Dane a trace of shyness, but he does not realize that this shyness is a mantle which her awakening soul is drawing about itself—he still regards her as a child and hides his love.

Dane is a frequent visitor at the Duncan home, and on one occasion Alene follows when the doctor takes Dane to inspect the one thing of interest in the village. This is a large silver cup which for many years has hung beside a mineral spring. Its origin is a mystery, and many traditions have been woven about it, so that no one in the village would dream of removing it. It is curiously engraved with a promise of health to whoever drinks from it here, and a warning that elsewhere it will give death. The most extraordinary feature is, however, that the water of the spring, absolutely undrinkable from any other vessel, has, when taken from this cup, astonishing medicinal value. Alene solves the mystery of the cup by telling them that Prof. Gershom placed it beside the spring when she was a child, though they can form no idea of his motives, or determine why the cup exerts so strange an influence on the water of the spring.

Shortly after, Alene chances to meet Abner Gray, a simple-hearted young villager who immediately falls in love with her. Alene observes on Abner's hand the ring which she saw upon the hand grasping the curtain in the House of Secrets, and concludes that Abner killed old Gershom, not being aware that the ring has just been found by Abner. This belief causes her to treat Abner with kindness—she is grateful that he should have done something which has resulted in a happier life for her. Her mind is not yet prepared to grasp the idea that to kill Gershom was a crime. She treats Abner with frank fondness, and Dr. Duncan is delighted, thinking that marriage to Abner would be a simple solution of the rather difficult problem of her future. Dane misunderstands Alene's attitude toward Abner and with self-depreciation deems her apparent turning to Abner natural and proper and as confirmation of his former idea that the preference she showed him in the first place was only a childish fancy. At this time Gilbert Jerome arrives in the village, coldly determined that if the documents which will dispossess him of his stolen fortune cannot be found and destroyed, Alene shall die.

MIXED FLATS (April 20).—Jack and Bob, pals, have been out for a good time. Jack gets word that his wife is returning home from her vacation. He engages a servant who is, of course, a stranger to her. Minister Blake rents a new apartment in the same house with Jack. He writes his wife, who is also on her vacation, to come home at once and make no mistake, but to come to their new home at 222 Lemon street. Mrs. Blake is the first to arrive home. It being strange to her, she gets into the wrong apartment. Jack is told by the servant of his wife's return. When he discovers the mistake, he tries with Bob's aid to get rid of the strange woman before his wife returns, but they fail. When the wife arrives and accuses her husband of duplicity, they cause such a racket that the minister upstairs becomes so alarmed that he starts to investigate and discovers his wife. She explains to her husband, who apologizes and all is forgiven.

THE TERRIBLE ONE (Special—Three parts—April 21).—Captain Pireida woes Felicia but it is Poncho Gonzales who wins her promise to be his bride, whereat the military rival proves a poor loser, and he schemes with his "man Friday" to accomplish Gonzales' downfall and get him out of the way. By manufactured evidence, the spy makes enough of a case against Gonzales to warrant his arrest. Pireida then misrepresents the facts to his superior officer in Mexico City, and obtains authority to use his own judgment in handling the case. He avoids an issue by allowing Gonzales an apparent opportunity to escape from prison. When Gonzales makes the attempt Pireida's soldiers fire and shoot him down. Pireida is ordered to the capitol, is promoted, and rapidly rises in power. Before leaving the scenes where the early part of the story takes place, Pireida goes to Felicia and tells her that Gonzales has been killed in trying to escape. Like Pireida, Felicia is ambitious and when he tells of his promotion and paints pictures of the position she will occupy as his wife, she consents.

Years pass, and Pireida becomes dictator of Mexico, but he is harassed by revolutionary outbreaks in the North. At first these are not of serious nature but when a mysterious leader arises among the revolutionists and leads them to one victory after another, Pireida becomes worried. His worry increases to alarm when reports reach him that the new insurecto leader, who is known among his men as "The Terrible One," has sworn a vow to press his attacks until he captures and executes the dictator. It soon becomes apparent that the only object of "The Terrible One's" brilliant military operations is the dictator. The implacable determination of his mysterious enemy begins to cause Pireida deep concern and then a sense of fear which he finds it difficult to conceal. Slowly but surely it is bringing to the surface the latent cowardice which always existed.

However, a great fear in his mind is the fear of being found out as a coward and this drives him to advance against the insurrectos. Because of his mental state he is practically defeated before he advances to meet "The Terrible One" in the field of battle. His forces are routed and with them he takes refuge in the Northern fortress, which the insurrectos batter down over their heads. When the victors swarm into the ruined fortress "The Terrible One" finds Pireida cowering with his wife in the commandante's apartments. There, face to face with his conqueror, Pireida recognizes him as Gonzales, who was not killed but only wounded. At that moment he knows that his life must be paid as the price of his treachery and he saves the executioners their trouble.

A DELAYED REFORMATION (Special -Two Parts—April 22).—Sid Rand, crook, escapes imprisonment through assistance tendered him by his sister, Bess, who is the wife of John Sterling, a magistrate. Bess, an innocent girl, zealously conceals her relationship to Sid. In freeing Sid from jail she unwisely borrowed the necessary money from Norton, a money lender. Norton, owing to Bess' obligation, makes improper advances toward her during their meetings in his quarters.

Meanwhile, Sid, repentant, has married Nell, a girl of the rural district, and has settled down upon a small farm, trying to live the life of a civilian. After a few months, farm life grows irksome to Sid and he determines to return to the city for a final plunge into the pickpocket game. Through a friend he obtained a two weeks' membership into a club. It so happens that Sterling is a member of the organization. On the night that Sid enters the club and "lifts" several pieces of jewelry from the members, Sterling is having an argument with a friend, Bates, on the psychology of criminals. Bates claims that a thief who wishes to live right can be trusted in an environment where stealing is easy. Sterling takes the opposite viewpoint. At this moment Sid, having discovered Sterling's identity, becomes conscience-stricken at the remembrance of the sacrifice his sister made and voluntarily returns the stolen articles to the club members. Here is a chance to test the argument under discussion. Sterling is finally prevailed upon to draw lots with Bates to determine at whose house Sid shall spend the night as a guest, thus affording a test as to his honesty. Sterling finds himself obligated to take Sid to his home, and Sid does not dare reveal himself to Sterling because of his sister.

On the night Sterling takes Sid home, Bess, rendered desperate by Norton's insistent demands for money, has agreed to meet him in her home at midnight, she believing at the time that Sterling is to be absent from the city that night. It is her intention to pay Norton with money taken by herself from her husband's safe. Bess is dumbfounded to see Sterling enter the house with Sid at 10 p. m. Sterling simply introduces Sid as a "guest" and eventually all retire.

At midnight Bess creeps downstairs to admit Norton and Sid follows her. Sterling, wakeful because of his suspicions of Sid, creeps downstairs. Sid hurries Norton by force from the room before Sterling enters, and what Sterling sees is Sid in possession of the bank-notes apparently held at bay by Bess with a revolver. It is a hurriedly conceived scheme on Sid's part to sacrifice himself for Bess. Sid is arrested and Sterling, as magistrate, convicts him. Bess, conscious of her deception, labors more and more under a tense nervous strain. One night Sterling, by accident, discovers that she has had dealings with Norton. Learning this much, he imagines much more. Enraged at the thought that he has convicted an innocent man because of Bess's duplicity, he drives her from home. He frees Sid next morning. Sid explains the entire affair to Sterling and both men start a search for Bess, which finally ends at Sid's farm, where Bess has sought refuge with Nell. Sterling and Bess effect a reconciliation, while Sid, having learned the lesson of his life, emphasizes his desire to reform for good.

INDISCRETION (April 23).—Jerome Howard, son of a millionaire banker, is engaged to Helen Barnes, a girl of his own class, to whom he is devoted. He cannot, however, resist the temptation to flirt with Agnes Murray, a girl employed in a florist shop, to which he goes daily to order Helen's flowers. Agnes soon learns to love the good-looking young chap, who is so different from any one she has ever known. He gives her a bunch of violets one day and these she highly treasures. They are seen together in the shop by Helen, who later forgives Jerome.

Agnes takes Jerome seriously, and when her good-for-nothing brother, Nick, shows her an item in the papers announcing his engagement she is heartbroken and angry. Nick suggests she bring a suit for breach of promise against Jerome, feeling sure the Howards will pay anything to keep such a scandal out of the papers. She consents, for it seems an easy way of revenge. The papers are served on the young man and, despite his protests that it is all simply blackmail, both his father and Helen believe the worst. Helen returns his ring, and when Agnes calls at the Howard home that evening with Nick and receives the $1,000 she has agreed to accept, she learns just how much harm she has done the man she loves. Then she confesses the truth and returns the money.

He goes to Helen to be received coolly by her, for she is going out motoring with another admirer. Jerome thinks things over and then decides to find Agnes, and hears at the florist shop that she has been discharged on his father's complaint. He finds her in a poor room, haggard and almost ill with grief and remorse. He soon convinces her that she is all he wants in the world. And she picks up the little faded bunch of violets he gave her so long ago, and as she holds them out to him he takes her in his arms.

THE HAUNTED ATTIC (April 24).—Owing to big doings in coon town the only hotel is overcrowded. John Edwards, traveling salesman, applies for a room, and is told that there is nothing vacant, except a garret that is haunted by a barber. John, not being afraid of spooks, takes the room. Blinks, the barber next door, has a parrot, who delights in imitating his boss. At twelve o'clock at night he will yell "Shave? You're Next." The sound travels to the hotel through the two chimney holes in the wall, giving the impression that the garret is haunted. John has an exciting

THE FRESH AGENT (April 24).—Martin & Co. receive a consignment of junk safety razors, guaranteed to remove whiskers—and skin. Scott, a fresh agent, agrees to sell them to the rubes in the next village. Scott is engaged to Mazie, daughter of Spriggs, a rube, whom he has never seen, having courted Mazie while she attended a seminary in the city. Mazie writes her mother, telling of the engagement, and Scott leaves for the village to sell the razors.

The energetic Scott sells a razor to every rube in the place, including Spriggs, obtaining $5 for each razor, a dollar down and a dollar a week. A week later every rube is wearing sticking plaster. They hold an indignation meeting and collect a fund to pay the fine of the man who beats up Scott. Arriving to collect the bills, Scott is driven from the first place at the muzzle of a gun. At another place he is chased with a club. Then he tries Spriggs and is handled rather roughly, but serious results are prevented by the timely arrival of Mazie, who introduces Scott and makes father shake hands. Father does so very reluctantly, and then presents Scott with his safety razor as a wedding gift.

MINA.

BUNKS BUNKED (April 29).—Father Bunk is a wealthy old felow who is thoroughly alive to the advantages of riches. He has a very pretty little daughter whom he has decided shall marry no other than a young man of exalted social position. Accordingly, when a count arrives in town Bunk immediately sends an invitation to the nobleman to attend a party in honor of his daughter. Daughter learns of the scheme and asserts herself vehemently that she will marry whom she pleases.

Daughter, in preparation for the party, has started on a shopping tour. On the way she is accosted by two ruffians who attempt to snatch her purse. The act is witnesed by young Hardy who rushes to her rescue, driving away the would-be robbers. The meeting is a case of love at first sight. Miss Bunk confides in Harry the intention of her father to marry her to the count. Together they scheme to get rid of the annoying peer.

At the party the count is present in all his glory. Harry gains access to the Bunk house garbed in girl's clothing loaned by Miss Bunk, and by posing as a friend of the hostess. His efforts to humiliate the count and cause him to leave the house are somewhat awkward and end in a fistic battle, in the progress of which Harry's wig is torn from his head and his scheme is exposed. Angered at the disturbance created by Harry, Bunk and the count snatch the tormentor by feet and shoulders and throw him through the window. Though bruised and battered, and with the joke on him, Harry appreciates the situation and has a big laugh at his part in it.

BIOGRAPH.

THE GAMBLER'S I. O. U. (April 12).—At the assay office in town, Jim Bevins turned his gold into dollars, then sat into a game because he felt lucky, and broke the gambler. On the way home two observers of his luck held him up. Badly wounded, he contrived to reach the mine and died in his partner's arms. Dick Smith found the gambler's I. O. U. in his pocket and kept it because he hoped to "meet up with the cuss some day." Drifting into the oil fields, he went to work for Daddy Wilson. He did not know that the old man, hard up, had borrowed $300 from that fellow Dawson who was hanging round his girl. He learned that fact when Dawson, furious because Nell turned him down, demanded instant payment of the note. Then Dick learned that this was the Dave Dawson whose I. O. U. he had found on Jim's body. Grimly he forced payment of the I. O. U. and returned the money to the gambler in payment of daddy's note. And he was gloriously surprised to learn that Nell loved him.

LORNA DOONE (Special—Two arts—April 13).—The enmity between John Ridd and Carver Doone began when John, as a lad, saw his father slain in defense of the Earl of Lorne's family, whom the marauding Doones killed with the exception of the little girl they spared, adopted and christened Lorna Doone. Grown to manhood, John was given cause to remember his oath of vengeance. The Doones, led by Carver, harried his estates and drove off his cattle. And Carver began a relentless persecution of Lorna, who loathed him. John met her in the forest and loved her. She saved his life when he was near to drowning; again, she saved him from the sin of murder when, at sight of Carver, the memory of his wrongs made him draw his pistol. John, in turn, rescued her from Carver after the death of old Sir Ensor Doone left her defenseless, and took her to his home. Carver, in revenge, informed the king's chancellor that Lorna was the heiress of the Earl of Lorne. Ordered to court, Lorna seemed lost forever to simple John. But fate led him to detect a conspiracy of the Doones against the king, and he was knighted. On the wedding day Carver attempted to kill John at the altar by firing through a window of the church. The bullet struck Lorna. Believing his darling dead, John executed a terrible vengeance upon Carver. But Lorna did not die, and years of happiness lay ahead for them.

THE TEST OF SINCERITY (April 15).—When the girl he loved proved false, Marvin sought forgetfulness in hard work—the excessive physical labor which dulls the brain. As a hewer of wood on the outskirts of civilization he had begun to forget when fate brought another girl across his path. She was wealthy, and already provided with a suitor. Marvin feared another bitter experience when he discovered her interest in him. Therefore he contrived an unfailing test of sincerity. He shaved off his beard and further disguised himself by altering his manner and the tones of his voice. In this guise he presented himself at her ball as a friend of the woodsman, who was ill. The ruse worked; she cared enough to seek out the man she had known, and wept at the prospect of losing him. Convinced of her sincerity, Marvin no longer restrained his love for her.

THE GIRL AND THE MATINEE IDOL (April 16).—Infatuated with Harold Morse, the romantic actor, the stagestruck girl secures a place in his company and shamelessly makes love to him, never dreaming that this heartbreaker has a charming wife and two children, whom he adores. Her suitor, whom she disdains because he does not measure up to her romantic standards, is in despair, and implores Morse, whom he knows, to disillusionize the girl. Morse arranges a clandestine meeting at his house, where the girl is received by Mrs. Morse, disguised as a maid, and shown into the actor's den, purposely disarranged to shock her. She hears his children calling for daddy, and is stunned by the realization that her idol is married. Morse introduces his wife; the outraged girl sees her suitor appear from behind drawn curtains, bursts into tears of mortification and flings out of the house. Her lover follows, and is accepted—not without a sigh of regret for her lost illusions.

ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS (April 17).—The price tag on the little Buddah read, apparently, $1.00. Young Mrs. Harvey charged it and did not discover her error until the bill came in. One hundred dollars—and Billy had scolded because she had "spent a dollar on junk!" She resolved to return the image, but the tramp to whom she had just given a handout had taken the only thing of seeming worth in the house. Billy was very good about it—he borrowed the money. She did not know that he had taken it from his employer's safe. And she had something else to think about—something wonderful. On the day when the baby came, Billy faced discovery. Mr. Carr was checking up the cash. He paused long enough to congratulate Billy and give him "something for the boy." Then he let fall some of the bills. Billy picked them up—and slipped the hundred dollar bill among them. Fate had saved him from the consequences of his theft.

"Newman Brass Frames and Rails"

More Convincing Proof

This time from Mr. Wm. Bigall of the Irving Theatre, Myrtle Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y. Here's what he has to say:

"'NEWMAN BRASS FRAMES' have been in constant use in my theatre front for over a year, but they look just as good as new. The expensive wood frames I bought prior to that time began to fall apart after about three months' use. There is nothing better than 'NEWMAN'S FRAMES' for lobby display and every wide-awake exhibitor should certainly have them."

"NEWMAN BRASS FRAMES" are waterproof. They cannot warp.

"NEWMAN BRASS FRAMES" are reinforced with steel corners.

"NEWMAN BRASS FRAMES" are made of heavy brass covered moulding, drawn through a special die which interlocks the metal to the wood, making one solid unit.

"NEWMAN BRASS FRAMES" have extra heavy glass front, and non-warpable compoboard backing which keeps the posters flat.

"NEWMAN BRASS FRAMES" are used by all big circuits.

"NEWMAN BRASS FRAMES" are used in 80% of the theatres. Are you one of them? If not write in to-day for our new catalog.

little Joan clasps a photograph of Philip to her breast. Joan loves Philip. Joan finds in Neva's room a note from Harcourt. She has an idea. She shows the note from Harcourt to Omar Khan, and says that if Philip finds his wife is disloyal to him, he will kill Neva and Harcourt. She pleads with Omar Khan, and cries: 'You are his friend. Can't you do something?"

Meanwhile, in his official stronghold, Amir Pasha dreams of a white woman for his harem. Slowly a smile passes over his cruel and dissolute features as the big idea comes to him. He will have a white woman—the loveliest white woman that money can buy. He executes his command and offers a thousand pounds in gold for a girl to suit his fancy.

A week later Omar Khan receives the offer from Amir Pasha. Joan, in the meantime, finds a letter written by Neva to her husband in which she says she will leave him forever. She shows this letter to Omar Kahn. Harcourt and Neva elope. Their carriage is stopped in a lonely spot by Omar Khan and his Nubians. Both are taken prisoners.

Philip returns to his home, finds his wife's letter and his heart is broken. Harcourt is left alone on a desert waste to die. Omar Kahn, with Neva as his prisoner, arrives at the palace of Amir Pasha, and says to him: "And this, Amir Pasha, is the present I have brought thee —a white woman for thy harem." While in the palace garden, the gladiator meets Iole and falls in love with her.

Laius asks the king to free the fair Christian and the king refuses. The king tries to force his attentions upon Iole, who is rescued by Latona. His Majesty then plans the gladiator's death. Orpheus, a friend of Laius, is stabbed by the king, who mistakes him for Laius. Laius finds his friend murdered and vows revenge. He enters just in time to rescue Iole from the king, and overcomes him. Aided by Latona, Laius and Iole make their escape.

Gwendolyn's father refuses his daughter permission to go with Leftington, and they elope. There is a pursuit of the couple by natives; an exciting struggle on a cliff. A rock is hurled which strikes Gwendolyn's father and pinions him to the ground. The witch doctor decrees that Kahma be thrown into the jungle stockade. However, the wild animals do not harm him, and the king, after a sleepless night, liberates his brother. He finds the white man's Bible, which Kahma reads during the terrible night, and asks that his brother's friends be his friends.

EDISON.

A WOMAN'S REVENGE (April 16—Special—Two Parts).—Effie Dorgan has just completed her toilet. Slim enters and asks her for money, which she refuses. He grabs her purse and takes what he wants. Subsequently, the pair meet in a restaurant, where Weston Davis, a business man, is dining with Bessie Aimes, a young and innocent girl. Effie sees Davis and recognizes him as the one who forced her to take her first drink. She sympathizes with the girl, and as Bessie is about to drink some liquor into which Davis has slyly dropped a drug, Effie interferes, telling Bessie not to drink. Effie directs Slim to take Bessie from the place, which he does, sending her home in a taxicab. Davis blows a police whistle which brings in the police. He shows a card and when the police are satisfied that Effie was forcing her attentions upon Davis, they take her from the place. She vows vengeance.

A scheme is worked out whereby Kathleen, the four-year-old daughter of Davis, is to be kidnapped. The child is suddenly whisked away from its nurse in the park, and the "prostrated" parents get a letter demanding $10,000 ransom. Davis has just failed in business, and the money cannot be raised by him. Mrs. Davis is "distraught" and decides to sell her jewels. She gets $1,000 in this way and accidentally drops it in front of her house just as Effie is coming. Effie picks it up and keeps it. Mr. Davis has notified the police in the meantime, and as the kidnappers are wise, they do not touch a decoy that has been placed at the given spot. However, another decoy is placed and Slim is caught as he appears to take it. Effie, in sympathy with Kathleen's mother, returns the child. When Effie is arrested, she has changed the nun's habit she wore when in Kathleen's company, so that the child does not identify her as the kidnapper. Effie gives the $1,000 to an orphan asylum for the care of children who have never known a mother's love.

THE LANDING OF THE PILGRIMS (A dramatic adaptation of the historical incidents surrounding the settling of Plymouth, Mass.—April 17).—The Separatists of Scrooby, England, persecuted for their heterodoxies, leave England and land at Leiden, Holland. After a stay of several months, Captain Myles Standish, a British officer doing military duty there, informs them that they will be given religious liberty by the London Company, settling Virginia at that time. The Pilgrims sailed in the Mayflower and touched at Provincetown, Mass., after a hard voyage. Captain Standish, a power among the refugees, whom he had consented to accompany to America, goes ashore with others to explore the coast. After a month, all the Pilgrims go ashore at Plymouth, landing upon Plymouth Rock. They set about at once to build houses. Trouble with Indians was ended practically by a treaty with Massasoit, who always held the treaty sacred.

Captain Myles Standish, a soldier through and through, with little time or place for sentimentality, falls in love with the demure maiden, Priscilla. He is loath to propose to her and gets his dearest friend, John Alden, to propose marriage for him. When John makes the proposel, Priscilla asks him, "Why don't you speak for yourself, John?" Returning to Captain Standish, Alden tells him what has happened. In a fit of rage, Captain Standish flays his friend, branding him as a betrayer of his friendship. Captain Standish, after he has had time to recover from the shock of her refusal, is once more dominated by the man in him and looks at the situation more philosophically. Instead of seeking reprisal, which he at first thought was due, he gazes upon the peaceful face of Alden, asleep in the cabin, and passes out and goes afar off to get solace in fighting the Indians.

MARTHA'S ROMEO (April 20).—Martha was chereful and stout, and, from all appearances, would be able to cook appetizing meals and do a good day's washing, but as far as the boarders in the house were concerned, she was unattractive. Satisfied that she should have a soulmate, Martha writes a letter to herself, purporting to be from a lawyer, advising her that she has been left $10,000 by a deceased brother. At the table the next morning, the men almost break their necks to fall into her favor. She treats them indifferently, stating that the man she marries must be a hero, like the show actor.

Waddy, a brass band actor, sees his chance, after Martha has rejected all the rest. Attired in Shakespearean garb, he rushes out to get a minister. Dragging the minister after him, Waddy climbs a ladder to Martha's window. At his approach, she is frightened and the watchdog, always on the lookout for prowlers, gets after the intruder. With characteristic tenacity, the dog holds on until Waddy succeeds in enveloping the animal in a coat and throwing it out of the window.

The noise has awakened the rest of the boarders, who rush into the halls and through the various rooms. One unfortunate fellow is shot by an excited fellow-roomer. When the latter sees what he has done, he forthwith shoots his comrade back to life. In the meantime, Waddy has been recognized by Martha, who has taken a position on a chair. Waddy is busy kissing the hem of her skirt. She has accepted him. Just at the critical moment, the crowd of excited roomers butt in and there is general chaos. As the roomers start to congratulate Waddy, Martha makes the startling announcement that she wrote the letter to herself. Waddy is furious. To appease him, Martha tells him she has a few rocks in the bank with which to build a foundation, and shows him a bankbook. A few dollars are better than none, so Waddy gladly accepts.

Talk No. 43

I have a surprise for you, Mr. Exhibitor, to spring in 30 days. It concerns Hallberg A. C. to D. C. and D. C. to D. C. Economizers — The surprise will please you because it will give you the Hallberg product at a lower price and with some improvements, too. As usual, I am in the lead about one to two years—You remember my advertisements in the M. P. World for A. C. Economizers were at least a year ahead of all others, on D. C. to D. C. I was two years ahead, AND ON A. C. to D. C. I HAVE BEEN OVER THREE YEARS AHEAD OF THE BUNCH.—HALLBERG SETS THE PACE WHEN IT COMES TO BRILLIANT AND PERFECT PROJECTION.—The others copy as soon as they can catch on to what Hallberg does. Don't waste your time experimenting for the other fellow—if he offers you something on 30 days' trial the reason is he has to or he could not sell it at all—if you try only my competitors' apparatus what good does the trial do you if you have nothing to compare it with—

SLEEP, BEAUTIFUL SLEEP (April 21).—Jonah Morpheus liked his bed, but it doesn't necessarily follow that he was insincere in his work, or in his attitude toward his employer. He wanted to get to the office on time mornings, but, having no direct control over himself while asleep, could not seem to wake up. The effete method of tying a string to the great toe and having someone pull it was tried, but Jonah always managed to get back to sleep again a few minutes after the rude awakening. Peggy, the maid, finally gets him out. Down the bannister he slides in his hurry, and when he strikes the post, bounces back to the top. Rushing out of the house, he strikes a man who resents the bump and hurls a brick at the fleeing Jonah. A man carrying some statuary stops the brick. Arriving at the office, Jonah is the target for a volley of abuse at the hands of his boss. After work, he goes and buys an alarm clock, the largest he can find.

The following morning there is a veritable bedlam in the boarding house. The clock goes off merrily, awakening everyone within a radius of a mile. The boarders rush here and there in search of the disturber. Miss Sodastraw, who takes anti-thin medicine every hour, has an alarm clock also, and between the two the tenants of the block are driven almost insane. Boots and shoes start to fly and when Jonah finally gets up, he finds that he is minus a shoe. Peggy contrives another alarm. A number of dishes are placed in the transom, but when Peggy tips it, she tips the wrong way, and is inundated by the dishes. Off to the office Jonah goes with the long boot. He fills it with water and arranges it so that it drains into the boss' silk hat. Peggy has another idea. She ties a rope around his neck and pulls. When the rope become taut, Jonah dreams that he is about to be hanged.

In one last attempt to be on time, Jonah ties a rope about his foot and tells a friend to pull the rope as he is passing by in the morning. The friend ties it to an express wagon, and Jonah is pulled out of a second story window, dragged along the street and down an embankment. He lands on a ditch just as a blast explodes. He is lifted into the air and after soaring serenely through the milky way, lands in his office on time.

OUT OF THE RUINS (Adapted from the popular story 'Miss 318" and "Mr. 37," by Rupert Hughes—Special—April 23).—"Miss 318," a salesgirl in the "Mammoth," a department store, is busily waiting on customers as the local fire inspectors survey the big store. The inspectors are not favorably impressed with the conditions and inform the proprietor, Abraham Hirschberg, that unless more means of egress are provided for, the building will be condemned. Mr. Hirschberg immediately consults with his lawyer, who succeeds in having the report of the inspectors "tabled" for a while. "Miss 318" attends a motion picture show, and when a woman in front refuses to remove her large hat, "Miss 318" is obliged to stand in the aisle. "Mr. 37," a fireman doing duty in the theater, informs her that she is not allowed to stand in the aisle. They become friendly and while they do not mention names, their numbers are exchanged. The next morning "Mr. 37" meets "Miss 318" and he tells her that the "Mammoth" is a firetrap. He makes some purchases in the store, not forgetting the most important thing, a diamond ring.

Several days later, while "Miss 318" is admiring the solitaire, Mrs. Lancaster Varden, wife of a millionaire, enters the "Mammoth" with her daughter, Priscilla. They are very affable, contrary to "Miss 318's" expectations. In the basement a careless porter has knocked a lighted cigar into a basket of rubbish and soon the blaze has spread beyond control. There is panic upstairs. The elevator is unable to carry down all the persons, and while Mrs. Varden is taken out by firemen, Priscilla is left with the less fortunate. She and "Miss 318" are helpless in the raging furnace. "Mr. 37" enters and offers to take his sweetheart out. She refuses and tells him to take Priscilla first, which he does. He works his way partly across a yawning chasm of hungry flames on a rope, with Priscilla clinging to him, and then the rope burns and the two swing against a building across the street and drop to the pavement. Soon after the entire wall of the store collapses, with "Miss 318" a prisoner. Before she left with her rescuer, Priscilla had placed a diamond bracelet about "Miss 318's" arm. The parents of Priscilla are unable to find her after the fire. "Miss 318," wearing the bracelet, is found beneath the smouldering ruins, and the firemen think it is Priscilla. Priscilla is found in the same ward as "Miss 318" later, and "Mr. 37," bandaged from head to foot, is brought to the little salesgirl. The scenes between these two and Priscilla and her sweetheart and parents are touching.

THE HEART OF A WAIF (April 24).—Mr. and Mrs. Joshua Jenkins are a childless country couple who are fond of children and do not hesitate to evidence their fondness. Mrs. Jenkins is keen for adopting a child, but lack of confidence in his ability to rear the child properly and affect a paternal nature makes her husband a bit reluctant. Finally he acquiesces, and a child of nine years, Jane, is legally adopted. Hardly has Jane become a member of the family when she is put to work and soon her frail little body begins to cry out in protest. She attends the country church with her foster parents and hears the minister preach a sermon around the text, "Bless them that persecute you." Some days later, Mr. Jenkins has occasion to drive a couple of tramps off the place, and it is evident that the vagrants intend to seek revenge. Jane is sent to the store with some eggs while her foster-father goes to the bank to draw some money. Some boys collide with Jane as she is carefully carrying the eggs, and immediately they are scrambled eggs all over the walk. As Mr. Jenkins leaves the bank he is seen by the tramps, who apparently have a scheme for revenge.

Jane is not contented in her new home, because she has to work so hard and all the sympathy she gets is from Tramps, her little kitten, who is her constant companion. When she is punished by her foster-father for breaking the eggs, Jane leaves home and wanders into the country, intending to return to the orphan asylum, where the work is not quite so hard. She is fatigued and lies down by the roadside to rest. As she sits down, she hears the two tramps on the other side of the fence planning to rob the Jenkins' home. At first she is glad, but the words of the minister flash across her mind. She hurries to the minister's home, arouses him and tells him of the scheme. He hurries for help, and when the tramps enter the Jenkins' home, they are overpowered. Mr. and Mrs. Jenkins then realize that their little charge has been overworked and decide to lessen the burden in the future. Jane is happy once more and holds on to her kitten with new strength. The next morning Jane is made ready for school, and work, so far as she is concerned, is forgotten.

THE AFFAIR OF THE TERRACE (April 20).—At the Terrace Inn are gathered guests from various parts of the world seeking a quiet resting place. At an introductory social function, a certain violin virtuoso, Hal Van Amkin, and a noted curio collector, Baron Rosbaum, join the guests. Van Amkin falls in love with Jasimine Roberts, one of the season's debutantes. The Baron shows marked attention to Countess Blankely. The latter is a charming widow, who delights to display her diamonds. At a ball given at the Inn, Mrs. Roberts, finding her daughter in Van Amkin's company, objects to the attention he is paying her and openly snubs him. In the morning the body of Mrs. Roberts is found at the bottom of the Terrace with a note roughly pinned to her waist, which reads: "I'm tired of living in an atmosphere of shame."

Everyone is hysterical over the affair, especially Mrs. Roberts' daughter, who refuses to see Van Amkin. Xavier Queer, a noted scientist, who has made a study of criminology and its motives, is one of the party which discovers the body of Mrs. Roberts. He and Jasimine meet at the ball and Xavier falls madly in love with her. She, on her part, has a strong friendship for him. He determines to help Jasimine all he can.

Xavier runs down one clue after another, but to no purpose. The local police and private detectives can do nothing to solve the problem. Xavier Queer hits upon the scheme of enacting the part of the murdered one, at the time of night he figures the crime was committed. A figure, disguised as a monk, steals up behind him. A tussle ensues and the figure leaps over the Terrace. Lights are brought and to the horror and surprise of all the guests they find the body is that of Baron Rosbaum. Pasimine's liking for Queer develops into admiration for the masterly way in which he unravels the mystery and that in turn develops into love.

THE LADDER OF FORTUNE (Two Parts—April 22).—Louis d'Angelo, a wandering minstrel, plays before the windows of an Italian's villa. From her casement above him, Delicia drops the rose worn in her hair. An attachment follows. Soon after we find Louis playing for a select gathering at the Romana salon where he makes his first appearance as Signor Romana's protege. Love has already interceded in his behalf. A constant admirer of Delicia and aspirant for her hand, Colonel Navarro, takes exception to the attentions of Louis and upon a certain occasion tells Delicia how he feels. She promptly silences him and he insults her. Louis, rushing to her defense, meets with opposition. A duel follows in which Louis comes out the victor, but, thinking he has killed his antagonist, he flees the country.

Landing in New York, Louis experiences the troubles of a foreigner unable to speak the language. A thief gets his roll. Eventually fortune puts him in the way of assisting in the arrest of the very man who robbed him. By this opportunity a job is found. He writes Delicia of his good luck and straightway buckles in to win his fortune. Fate again intervenes in the person of Navarro, who, finding Louis out of reach, pushes his suit. He purloins Louis' mail from America, thereby causing Delicia to half believe herself forgotten.

Meanwhile, Louis pines for some word from her and in the meanwhile rises to a position of trust with his employer. At this time a letter from a N. Y. lawyer reaches Louis' employer asking if one Louis d'Angelo works for him and advising him that there has been a fortune left to Louis by a Bowery recluse whom our hero had at one time befriended. Louis' employer and his daughter scheme to ensnare Louis into marrying. He withholds the news of the legacy meanwhile.

Delicia, unable to stand the suspense longer, sails secretly for America. Her parents and Navarro follow on the next boat. They find her in her hotel. Later they dine ensemble in an Italian resort. To this same restaurant comes Louis with his employer and his daughter. Recognitions follow and thereafter not even the fires of Vesuvius could part Delicia and Louis.

THE FATAL KISS (April 19).—Shultz and wife are business partners, ladies' and gents' furnishings being their specialty. Wife happens to be very busy with a persistent customer when Trixie, the Doll of the Gaiety theater, comes in. Shultz sees Trixie. It is, of course, necessary for him to wait on her. And Trixie, being somewhat of a coquettish disposition, during her purchasing engages in the flirtation with ardor. Wife sees it all. She longs to give vent to her outraged feelings. Trixie makes arrangements to have her purchase delivered to her dressing room. Shultz, in gleeful anticipation, assures her he will attend to the matter personally. But later, when Shultz is about to leave on the errand, Wife gets wind of his destination. She immediately takes things into her own hands, deciding to deliver Trixie's package, herself. He objects, strenuously. She marches him into their back room and locks him in. Wife is just departing when Day-Light Luke, a burglar in search of loot, enters the store and holds her up. Terrified, she dashes to the door, unlocking it and rushes to the protecting arms of hubby. Luke follows. During the ensuing scrimmage, Wife gets control of Luke's revolver. The tables are turned. Shultz phones for the police. He dashes out into the store to obey. But here the foxy Shultz remembers his date with Trixie. He takes mean advantage of the situation and goes to deliver Trixie's purchase. Wife is left holding the burglar at bay.

For his trouble, Shultz receives a nice kiss from Trixie on his cheek. But she has just been making up her lips with rouge. He does not know that he carries an imprint of her lips on his cheek when he returns home, care-free. Such a thing as possessing a wife has gone from his mind when he gaily enters the store. He soon learns how matters stand, however. Wife, still holding off the burglar, has herself, telephoned for the police. She now quickly spots the imprint of Trixie's lips on hubby's cheek. Things then hum! Luke, the burglar, finds it an easy matter to escape. The police arrive. The outraged wife sees her way to punish her wicked hubby. She promptly turns the horrified Shultz over to them as their man. Shultz's pleadings avail him nothing. Ninety days on the rock-pile is his sentence.

WHEN WAR THREATENED (April 24).—Mrs. Van Smithers is giving a state dinner to which several diplomats and society leaders are invited. Her French cook and German butler are madly in love with the English maid. Frenchy, the cook, brings her a tribute of frog legs. Dutchy, the butler, gives her a choice Limburger cheese. Mary Ann is open to conviction but a whiff of the cheese and taste of the frog precipitates a cyclone in the kitchen. Mrs. Van, blaming Mary Ann, discharges her. The guests arrive and with them comes Jack, the American chauffeur. He sneaks around to Frenchy's back window and helps himself to dainties cooling at the window. Frenchy at length discovers him and grabs his hand but Jack escapes leaving his newspaper in Frenchy's hand. Then trouble begins, for Frenchy reads that General Bologna has massacred thousands of General Houp-la's troops. A pitched battle follows between Frenchy and Dutchy with the dinner as ammunition. Meanwhile, consternation reigns in the dining room.

The guests are starving. There is excitement outside the kitchen window, also, for Jack has met Mary Ann leaving, and fallen in love with her. They watch the battle through the kitchen window, with great glee. Frenchy discovers them and tells Dutchy. Both stop battling and start after Jack and Mary Ann who hurry away in his auto. Frenchy and Dutchy hire a junkman to give chase with his wagon. Jack reaches the parsonage and is married as Frenchy and Dutchy arrive. Mrs. Van discovers the fate of the delayed dinner and she and the guests get the dinner themselves. They are having a high time over the dinner when Frenchy, Dutchy and Mike, the junkman, arrive. Mike, finding that Frenchy and Dutchy cannot pay for his service, proceed to eat up everything left in the kitchen. Frenchy makes a cake and ices it with the words "War Is Hell," which makes a great hit with the diners. Then, with Mary Ann gone out of their lives forever, Frenchy and Dutchy make friends and forget their differences. Meanwhile, Mike, left to his own resources, sees a chance to get his pay so cleans out the furniture of the kitchen and drives away with it.

WILD BLOOD (April 19).—Walt Hiller, formerly a Tennessee mountaineer, becomes a doctor. He is the sole survivor of the family and loathes the feud he has inherited. His foes are Bess Browne and her brother, Lester, who are the last of their family. One day Walt is attracted by Bess and her brother who fire at him, breaking the window pane over his shoulder. Walt rushes from the house with a rifle and a roll of rope with the determination of ending the feud once and for all. As he rushes from the house he sees Les' rifle levelled at him and is forced to shoot him in self defense. While Bess is attempting to revive her brother, Walt smashes Les' gun over the rocks. Walt then binds her hand and foot and carries them to their home. Shortly after Les dies and Bess swears vengeance on Walt. Walt, in the meantime, has packed all his belongings and goes to the city to study his profession.

Bess goes to Walt's cabin in her search for him and meets the old mountaineer, who tells her Walt has gone to the city. Bess follows Walt to the city and gets work in a hospital in hope of meeting him. Five years have elapsed and Walt has become a famous surgeon. Bess is a nurse in another hospital. One day while she is on her way to the hospital, she is injured in an elevated railway accident. The injured are taken to the hospital where Walt is head surgeon. A doctor examines her injuries and tells Walt that she must have a great deal of some one else's blood if she is to recover. Walt bends over to examine her and recognizes Bess. He then offers his own blood to restore Bess' life.

The operation is performed and is successful. When Bess has recovered, she asks to meet the man who saved her life. Walt orders the attending physician to bandage his head so that she will not recognize him. They have a long talk and Bess tells Walt that she can't accept his love until she has performed her one mission in life which is to have the life of the man who killed her brother.

A short time elapses and Walt is called to perform a very difficult operation at the hospital where Bess is a nurse. The operation over, Walt removes his mask and Bess, who is the attending nurse, recognizes him and draws a revolver, which she has carried for five years. She levels it at Walt saying, "I want your blood." Walt wrenches the gun from her hand, saying, "You have my blood; it is running in your veins now." Bess then learns that Walt was the one who saved her life and permits the young doctor to take her revolver from her and to fold her in his arms.

THE MYSTERY OF THE YELLOW CURL PAPERS (Two Parts—April 23).—Finding that Flo is too despondent over the poor business of her stock company to give much attention to his thirteenth proposal of marriage, Ted Raymond, her leading man, rushes down the street bent on digging up some press agent scheme whereby the company's business will boom. He has an idea born of seeing a lady advertising curl papers in a drug store window. At this time both Ted and Flo receive invitations to a week-end at a country inn. Ted persuades Flo to place a century note in each of her curl pa-song hits and playlets, are well known in the East. They have not been exhibited, however, west of the Mississippi or in Canada.

We have now on hand 186 negatives all manufactured by us in the past six months, and we are releasing and manufacturing four new pictures every week.

Please understand that these pictures are not used with a singer, but are used in connection with a phonograph, which, by a simple patented attachment, synchronizes and keeps in perfect time with the film. This is not an experiment.

Remember that this is an entirely new and novel form of entertainment. These pictures furnish the long needed break in the monotony of regular film service.

WE offer the greatest opportunity in the film business. We are now operating successfully five of our own exchanges (see addresses below) in New York, Pittsburgh, Columbus, Chicago and Boston.

On account of the difficulty well known to film men of keeping proper supervision over exchanges located too far from the home office, we have decided not to open offices west of the Mississippi, or in Canada, but to allot that territory to film men of merit.

A rare chance is now offered.

We are ready to show you by our own figures just what we have done.

If you should be near any of our exchanges, call. You will see the number of exhibitors using our regular weekly program. These pictures are a proven success.

These films can be supplied to exhibitors at a surprisingly low price. They are without doubt the greatest drawing card yet offered.

Everything runs smoothly until Ted reaches the ground after taking the papers. Here the town constable, lying in wait for repeated chicken thieves, pounces upon him and, in the fracas, manages to wrest away Ted's watch fob as that excited young man breaks for the wods. Meanwhile, the real chicken thief has made his escape after severely wounding the constable's deputy. Detectives are on the job immediately and it becomes altogether too warm for Ted, who is saved from arrest at the last moment by the apprehension of the real culprit. Incidentally, the advertising pays, the public flocks to see Flo and her company and, out of gratitude, Flo marries her resourceful leading man.

NESTOR.

EDDIE'S AWFUL PREDICAMENT (April 20).—Eddie has spent his salary and is down to the last dime. He is gloomy in consequence and tries various of his friends to get a "little" loan, but they all give him the "cold shoulder." He goes back to his room and gets a telephone call from his girl who wants him to take her out to see the Fair. Eddie meets a friend who hands him five dollars which Eddie had loaned him some time before.

Eddie and Vic take in everything at the Fair. Wishing to make a good impression on Vic, Eddie buys everything she asks for. When they come out Eddie has just a quarter left out of the five, which he figures will about take him home. But Vic proposes to have dinner and Eddie, of course, agrees. They go into a restaurant with Broadway prices, and are just getting nicely settled, when Vic sees her friend, Mrs. Sponge and her daughter. Victoria is glad to see them and, of course, they must stay to dinner with her. They order. Mrs. Sponge especially orders the best and all are having a merry time but Eddie. The nearer the end of the dinner draws the more desperate he gets. At last he has an inspiration. He will sell his watch.

Making his excuses, he goes outside and tries to sell a $100 watch for $20.00. As it usually happens, he is taken for a thief. A cop takes his watch from him, warning him to get out. He wanders about and coming across a blind man, decides he might just as well be broke as to have only a quarter and puts it in the blind man's cup. The old man thanks him effusively and tells Eddie he can't see at all. Eddie grabs the cup, making off at top speed. But the same old cop who has his watch captures him.

Eddie explains his predicament and tells the blind man that if the cop had not got his watch he wouldn't have had to steal from the blind. Meanwhile at the restaurant, the head waiter is beginning to worry who is to pay for the dinner and champagne, and asks the ladies at the table. They tell him that Eddie will settle the bill. The waiter is about to order them out, when Eddie comes in, accompanied by the "blind" man. The blind man sees Eddie's position, and, pulling a roll of bills as large as a ham out of his pocket, nonchalantly peels of a half dozen for Eddie, and tells him to go on and have a good time.

TWO HEARTS AND A SHIP (April 23).—Eddie, the barber, is deeply in love with Lizzie, a beautiful fruit vender, and the only cloud in their sky is Tony, who is also deeply in love with the charming maiden. Lizzie, like the majority of her lovely sex, is prone to indulge in harmless flirtations and this, together with her preference for Eddie, throws Tony into a frenzy of rage.

Tony goes to a dive and plots with two gangsters to kidnap Lizzie for him and bring her to a deserted wharf. The two villains accomplish their purpose, but Eddie hears her scream and sets out in pursuit. Just as he is about to reach her he is knocked out. When he revives she is nowhere to be seen. Eddie finally finds her and they escape, closely pursued by the three villains. Their escape cut off, Eddie takes to a launch and boards a passing steamer.

The three villains find out where Eddie and his love have flown and board the same boat, unknown to the now happy couple. Lizzie is again captured and is about to be taken off in a boat when Eddie misses her. A long chase ensues, in which Eddie is mistaken for the villain by the boat's sailors. They are about to treat him roughly, when the captain and Lizzie arrive in time. The villains are put in irons while Eddie and his sweetheart speed the dying sunset with a kiss.

LOVE AND HAND CUFFS (April 24).—Case Saunders, an old moonshiner, has two sons, Red and Jack, and a daughter, Elsie. Dick Fuller, a U. S. Secret Service agent, receives orders to investigate the report that Case Saunders is operating a still in Rocky Valley. Red Saunders, old man Saunders' son, is a mountain bully and it is plain to be seen that he dominates both his father, younger brother and his sister.

Elsie Saunders meets Dick Fuller, who is captivated by her mountain beauty. L ter he is sighted by Red Saunders who shoots him and leaves him for dead. Dick is only slightly injured in the arm, however. Elsie comes to his assistance, bandages the arm and cares for him. Red Saunders orders the destruction of the still owing to the fact that things have become too "warm" for them. Dick Fuller later captures Elsie's father but she outwits him by extracting his hand cuffs from his pocket while he is holding her father at the point of his gun and then handcuffs her wrist to that of the secret service agent, thus allowing her father to escape.

Red Saunders falls down a cliff as he is about to strike his younger brother and is killed. The father and his remaining son make their way across the border line to safety. Fuller asks the girl for an explanation of her action, but she says nothing. As the story ends the secret service agent folds her in his strong embrace.

THE WAR OF THE WILD (Two Parts—April 24).—William Wallace, an American circus owner, visits Central Africa to hunt wild animals with which to replenish his menagerie. His daughter, Marie, and his trainer Steve Larson, accompany him. They arrive in Kronjez, a small village, and Wallace makes arrangements with one, John Plymton, a local hunter, to secure for him a number of wild animals and to pilot him to the best hunting grounds. Plymton proves so congenial that Wallace promises him a permanent engagement in America if their hunting expedition is successful, which it proves to be, beyond even Wallace's expectations.

Larson, the trainer, is infatuated with Marie, who, however resents his attentions. Plymton's interest in Marie, and his success in the hunt, arouses the jealousy of Larson, and excites in him a desire for revenge. He watches closely for an opportunity to crush Plymton, and feels that Fate is working with him when he sees his rival being chased by a man eating lion. The timely shot of Wallace who arrives on the scene not a moment too soon, saves Plymton's life. It is with difficulty that Larson conceals his anger at this frustration of his hopes to rid himself of Plymton. When, however, the hunting party has succeeded in catching a ferocious lioness, Larson brings one of the helpers to free the lioness, believing that it will attack Plymton. The helper is repaid for his treachery by being chased himself by the lioness. He is badly lacerated and torn. In this sorry plight, feeling that he will not recover, the helper accuses Larson, and so indignant and angry does Plymton become at such diabolical treachery that he drives Larson from the camp.

The next day Larson meets a company of Arab slave traders, and persuades them to attack the hunters, promising they will be well rewarded with both slaves and plunder. The Arabs willingly act on Larson's suggestions, and when they come upon Wallace, Plymton and their party, a pitched battle takes place in which the Arabs are successful. Larson seeks out Marie and is in the act of carrying her off when Plymton's elephant, which has been kindly treated by Marie, comes to her rescue by attacking Larson and throwing him over a cliff. The elephant, having accomplished this, returns to Marie, picks her up and carries her to Plymton's house. In the meantime, Plymton has succeeded in saving himself and Wallace from the Arabs, and they arrive in Kronjez in flight from their Arabian pursuers, but grieving over the fate of Marie and the loss of their associates. The failure of the expedition and all else, however, is forgotten in their joy at finding that Marie has been carried home by the elephant.

POOR POLICY (April 25).—Billie took out a policy which worked two ways. It was good for a loan of $3.75 or $500 in case of fire. He tried to collect on both clauses but had not counted on rivals and sweethearts. His rival extinguished Billie's insurance blaze and to cop Billie's troubles an ostrich swallowed the bracelet he had bought for his girl. In addition, an unkind note he had written in his rival's name fell into hostile hands and was read by unfriendly eyes. When the fire department and hoses had their turn, Billie found himself completely cured of any inclination to realize on fire insurance policies.

MAVIS OF THE GLEN (Three Parts—April 21).—While on a vacation yachting cruise, Robert Graham makes a landing in an out-of-the way spot and comes upon Mavis, the foster child of Old Peter. He is infatuated with the girl and after a short courtship makes her his wife. He returns home, where his sister, Mrs. Nainby, is much vexed at his marrying such an ignorant, unconventional girl as Mavis. She makes things very unpleasant for the young girl, and finally weans her brother away from his dowdy little wife. Mavis thereupon hits upon a plan and in the absence of her husband, hires a French maid, buys beautiful gowns and in other ways, fits herself in accordance with her husband's position. When he returns he does not so much as think of his little wife, having been completely won over by his sister.

He goes to his club, where he is invited by some of his chums to attend a reception and to meet the smartest little society woman of the day. Imagine his consternation upon meeting the society favorite to find that she is his own little wife transformed. He tries to win her back, but she almost ignores him. In a short time Graham becomes little more than Mrs. Graham's husband, which causes him no end of annoyance. Mavis continues to progress in the social world. Graham's sister, Mrs. Nainby, carries on a clandestine love affair and her husband finds a note from her lover. Mavis, to save Mrs. Nainby from her husband's wrath, declares that the unaddressed love note was sent to her.

This causes complications with her own husband, who happens to overhear her statement. Mavis tries to right herself in her husband's eyes, but jealousy prompts him to refuse to acknowledge her explanation. With nothing left to her in life, Mavis returns to Old Peter. Graham at last really understands that Mavis is, after all, the only woman in the world he loves, and seeks her out. He finds her living with Old Peter. He again pleads his love, and is forgiven, for the heart of Mavis still remains true to her husband.

THE FEAR WITHIN (April 22).—The story deals with Brother Gregoire, a Spanish monk, living in a Mexican monastery. He is deeply devoted to Pedro, a young village boy. When volunteers are called for in the village, Pedro joins eagerly. His mother, hearing the news, begs him not to go, saying that his father was killed in the war. Brother Gregoire also is frightened and begs the boy to remain but, in spite of all, he leaves.

At midnight three weeks later, while his mother prays in her little home, and Brother Gregoire keeps an all night vigil before the altar, the first shot comes as the boy lies sleeping in his tent. He awakens, and again the cannons roar out on the still night. With a terrified look he leaps to his feet and slides cautiously out of the tent. He eludes the sentinels, passes the line, and makes for his home. He bursts in upon his mother at her prayers, and she can scarcely believe it is her boy. Meanwhile, the boy's flight has been discovered, and the commandant and a few soldiers start in search of Pedro. The mother says he must go to Brother Gregoire, as he will hide him, and together the two start for the Monastery. The boy leaves his mother in the garden and finds Brother Gregoire at his prayers. He tells Pedro to bring his mother in, as he wishes to meet her. The boy obeys, and the mother and the monk face each other, tensely. Pedro looks from one to the other in amazement, and asks if they know each other. Both nod, and Brother Gregoire bids the woman tell the boy her story.

She relates how she and Gregoire were betrothed and how he left for the war. Later he was reported dead, and she, heartbroken, lived on with her old mother in abject poverty, until the rich young man of the town, Manuel, proposed marriage, and she accepted. Shortly before Pedro was born, Manuel also went to war, and was killed before Pedro's birth. Then Gregoire takes up the story, saying he heard of her marriage to Manuel while in the hospital. A holy brother offered him the solace of the church, and he accepted. As the story finishes there is a noise outside and they all realize it is the commandant in search of Pedro. There is

THE WHIRLING DISK Two Parts—April 20.)—Dr. Harvey Beldon is in love with Aida Dale, the daughter of Prof. Dale, with whom Beldon is associated. While friendly with Dr. Beldon, Aida's heart is in the keeping of Dr. Dyer, a specialist on diseases of the nerves. Prof. Dale decides to spend some time at a certain observatory. Dr. Beldon, realizing the hopelessness of his attempt to win the hand of Aida, decides to apply to the girl his new method of auto suggestion. To this end, he brings into play his whirling disk. Aida succumbs and falls into a state of hypnosis, and Dr. Beldon gives her his suggestions: viz.: that every hour of her twenty-four, whether asleep or awake, she will both see and feel his personality near her; that she will forget the personality of Dr. Dyer, and, in the end, surrenders herself to him, Dr. Beldon. The suggestions having been given, Beldon awakens Aida, apologizes for the presence of the whirling disk, and bids her good-bye. In the mountains, Aida is left to her own resources, for Prof. Dade's time is given to work in the observatory. She takes to wandering about the hills, meets the villagers, and listens to tales that amuse and, at times, frighten her. But always she is conscious of thoughts of Dr. Beldon. She endeavors to throw these thoughts off, but is unsuccessful.

One day while ministering to an aged crone, she hears a tale, which has to do with the presence on the mountain of a mysterious dog.

Later Aida is startled at the presence of a huge dog which drinks at the stream, then starts off. Curiosity overcoming fear, Aida calls to the animal. The dog comes to her, evinces a friendly disposition and then runs away. Again she comes in contact with the animal, and, to her great joy, succeeds in keeping him near her for a considerable time, finally coaxing him to accompany her home, but failing to coax him into the house. Later Aida and the dog are together upon the mountain when the animal, in an excess of affection, suddenly rises upon its hind legs and rests its fore feet upon her shoulders, gazes into her eyes. Instantly the form of the dog merges into the personality of Dr. Beldon. Time and again this hallucination asserts itself, until, as Aida's mind weakens, she comes to encourage the dog's original action, each time metamorphosing the dog's personality into that of Dr. Beldon.

Ere long, Prof. Dale comes to realize that his daughter is not herself. Following her into the mountains, he witnesses her actions with the dog, real, to Aida, but alarmingly significant of an unbalanced mind in the eyes of her father. Alarmed, he sends for Dr. Dyer. Together they question Aida, who laughingly tells them of the materialization of her canine playfellow. Dr. Dyer draws from her the story of the whirling disk, suspects that his rival used it upon Aida and hastens to bring Dr. Beldon to the scene. He then forces his rival to undo the damage he has done to the innocent girl. Dr. Beldon slinks away, Aida recovers her mental equilibrium, and Dr. Dyer loses no time in making himself her life-long protector.

THE STOOL PIGEON (Two Parts—April 19).—Walter Jason, a young man from the country, comes to the big city to find a position, but fails to do so. Oswald Trumble, so known to society, though in reality a master crook, strolls through the park, his mind busy with a scheme to steal the jewels of Mrs. Crosby Moore, a leader of society, whose forthcoming fancy-dress ball is the talk of the town. As Trumble approaches the bench where Jason is seated, the young man arises, shows exhaustion and then slowly continues on his way. Struck with Jason's clean-cut appearance, Trumble follows the young man, trails him to the river, and prevents him from committing suicide. Later, we find Trumble and Jason, seated together in the grill of a hotel, the latter doing justice to a full meal, purchased by Trumble. Still later, we find Jason in Trumble's apartments, where the latter, under the guise of disinterested friendship, is urging the young man to exchange his shabby clothing for a more fashionable suit. Still later, Trumble introduces Jason into his social set, setting the young man's mind at rest with the explanation that he, Jason, can be of assistance in the disposition of certain bonds, securities, etc., in which Trumble deals. Jason accepts the explanation, also Trumble's money, and makes himself agreable to those to whom he is introduced.

In the course of events, Jason meets Mildred Moore, only daughter of the society leader whom Trumble has marked as his prey. Mutual attraction follows the meeting, though Jason, while recognizing the fact that Miss Mildred is partial to him, forbears from taking advantage of the situation. On the contrary, the crafty Trumble urges Jason to press his suit, for the master criminal knows that Jason's entree to the Moore home will give him the opportunity for which he is waiting. A week prior to the date of the fancy-dress ball, Jason received a card of invitation. He decides not to avail himself of the invitation. Trumble, in a rage, accuses Jason of ungratefulness. Whereupon Jason relents, and sends his acceptance.

That night Trumble plans his coup. Thus: Jason will be certain to stroll outside the country house with Mildred Moore. Some pretext will be invented whereby Jason will be called away from her, her abduction will follow, and another young woman, attired in Mildred's costume, or its duplicate, will be substituted in her place. Upon Jason's return, he will conduct his masked partner into the house, where, with the assistance of outside confederates, Mrs. Moore will be enticed up-stairs and robbed of her jewels. Everything goes as planned, save that Jason, upon his return to the garden fails to see upon the arm of his partner a certain mole, to which, earlier in the evening he had referred as a "beauty spot." His suspicions aroused, Jason conducts his partner to the house, excuses himself, and loses no time in acquainting the detectives, who are present at Mrs. Moore's request, with his suspicions. The girl is caught, unmasked, given the third degree and forced to confess. A trap is set, and Trumble, with others of his gang, are captured. Jason forces Trumble to tell where Mildred is secreted and then rescues the frightened girl. Having returned the girl to her mother, Jason makes an honest confession, in which he accuses himself as the instrument, though an unwilling one, whereby Trumble was enabled to carry out his scheme. Mildred and her mother forgive him, however, and soon after the engagement of the young couple is announced.

THE ARTIST AND THE VENGEFUL ONE (April 23).—Helen Adams, having unpleasant attentions paid to her by Dr. Toms, leaves the city for her hunting lodge. Being bored to extinction, she goes for a stroll through the woods and accidentally meets Mr. Felix Grim, a young artist from the city, who is occupying his friend's lodge. Felix takes Helen to his lodge and having fallen in love with her, immediately proposes. She rejects him but accepts a portrait from him as a parting gift. Upon her return to her lodge, she finds through a note, that Dr. Toms has left the city. Very much elated over the fact, she and her mother plan to return at once. She dispatches a note to Felix.

Snowie, a criminal, who was sentenced to Sing Sing by Helen's father, escapes. He returns to his gang and vows vengeance, not on Helen's father, but on Helen. Helen and her mother arrive home, but are spied upon by the gang, who are awaiting the proper moment to strike. Felix, broken hearted at being spurned, decides to return. Several nights later, Helen's mother and father leave the house. Helen is left alone with the exception of the butler. Snowie being informed of this fact, orders his men to abduct her.

In the meantime, Helen falls asleep, dreams of Felix and runs to her room to look at the portrait he gave her. Turning the canvas over, she finds his telephone number. Just for a lark she 'phones him and invites him over. Felix hurries to call. While awaiting Felix's arrival, the gang ring the bell and strangle the butler. Helen sees what has happened and is distraught, but realizes that Felix is coming and will save her. She writes a note and places it under the canvas and then rushes to her room and locks herself in.

The gang enter the house and begin to loot the place when the bell rings. They open the door, pounce upon Felix and force him to make Helen open her door by speaking to her. She does so. Snowie rushes into the room and Felix is thrown back among the gang. Felix manages to escape the gang and through the window enters Helen's room where he struggles with Snowie. Snowie's revolver is discharged. The shot brings the police and the gang is captured. Helen's mother and father return and find their daughter safe and soon after announce her engagement.

He makes up, and goes to Jenkins' home town, where his agreeable personality soon turns the popular mind in Hi's favor. He wins at poker. The spinster smiles upon him. And when Jenkins returns, having received a tip from the actor, that if he is silent all will be well, he finds himself the best-liked man in the village. His grouchy disposition never comes back. And he marries the lady of his choice. (Note: This is the first of the releases under the Falstaff brand, which replaces the Princess in the Mutual program).

BY FAIR MEANS OR FOWL (April 11).—The town marshal is in love with Susie, the daughter of Silas Crank. Susie has another admirer in Willie, a friend of Judge Short, who is running for re-election. Silas Crank is his political rival. The town marshal makes life miserable for Willie, and Willie resolves to get even. He does so by purchasng a chicken and then pretending to steal it. The ostentatious marshal arrests him but is discomforted when Susie comes to the rescue of Willie and proves that the chicken was not stolen.

Silas Crank has prepared to give his followers a banquet, but when the friends gather, Silas learns from his wife that the refrigerator containing the food has been stolen. Susie and Willie, in the park, see a tramp walking away with the refrigerator. They notify the marshal, who refuses to believe them, having been fooled once before by Willie and the chicken. Susie and Willie meet Silas and his followers. They tell them of seeing a tramp with the missing ice box.

In the meantime, the tramp has carried off the contents of the refrigerator in his arms. The marshal meets the tramp and takes the stuff away from him, and ordering him out of town, he sits down to enjoy a quiet repast. He is caught in the act by the angry Silas and crowd. The marshal is disgraced. The disappointed crowd leaves Silas and rallies to Judge Short. Willie and Susie are too busy making love to be worried about the outcome of the election.

The Countess de Shilac is forced to send her regrets by a messenger, and by chance, a society crook intercepts the messenger and plans to have his adventuress wife go to the reception and pose as the countess. He then sends the boy on with the message. Mrs. Climber is deeply disappointed when she learns that the Countess will not be present. Ethel arrives, and Mrs. Climber, in order to satisfy her guests, introduces Ethel as Countess de Shilac.

The crook and adventuress arrive and announce themselves as the Count and Countess. Mrs. Climber is in a quandary; she must not let her guests know her deception. She is very busy keeping the crook and adventuress in the reception room (where they help themselves to odd articles of jewelry), while Ethel is being made a great deal of by the guests in the parlor. Ethel accidentally learns that the Countess de Shil~ is in the reception room (really the adventuress). She thinks it time for her to get away, but the guests pay her so much attention that she is unable to make a graceful exit.

Some of the guests miss their jewelry. Ethel is acting strangely, and she is suspected. The crooks begin to feel uncomfortable and manage to plant one of the stolen articles on Ethel. Bill arrives with a message that Ethel hurry back to the office—the boss wants her. The guests now realize that Ethel is not the Countess and when the detectives arrive they point accusing fingers at her. The two crooks continue their role of count and countess. They show disgust at what is going on, and, paying their respects to Mrs. Climber, start to go. Another detective in the hall recognizes them as crooks and brings them back. At this juncture, the real Countess de Shilac arrives, much to the surprise of all. The detectives find the two crooks utterly loaded down with valuables, and Ethel is released.

MAJESTIC.

THE COMEBACK (Two parts—May 2).—Just as Dennison handed to Richard Borden a curiously engraved revolver to examine, Sinclair mentioned the name of a girl about whom he had been talking. Borden demanded a retraction and an argument followed, and ended by Borden emptying his weapon point blank at Sinclair, who drops. The fourth member of the little group, Fred Dexter, Borden's cousin, whisks Borden away in his auto, telling Borden he believes he has killed Sinclair and hiding him in Dexter's apartments. Cut off from everyone, Borden is told by Dexter after a fortnight that Sinclair has recovered and is seeking Borden, vowing vengeance. Dexter offers to exonerate Borden by going on the stand and relating the story that led Richard to shoot Sinclair, but Borden will not have the girl's name thus published broadcast. Dexter then urges Borden to escape, suggesting New Zealand.

Borden is obliged to give up his painting in New Zealand, as it would betray his whereabouts, but secures a position as illustrator on the Wellington Argus, under an assumed name. Some eight months later, Carr, the city editor, shows Borden a cut in the N. Y. Herald which bears striking resemblance to himself. Borden confesses his identity and tells his story. The Herald item states that Dexter had identified a man found dead in the woods as his cousin, Richard Borden, missing for several months; and Dexter being next of kin, the item continues, inherits the fortune of Francis Borden, South African millionaire, who died on July 18 of the previous year, willing his fortune to Borden.

Carr unfolds his theory. At the time of his uncle's death, Borden was traveling across the Atlantic. Dexter planned a stag party immediately on Borden's arrival to keep the news away from him, and with the other two as fellow conspirators carried out the shooting incident. The revolver was loaded with blanks and Borden was whisked away before the true damage was learned by him. Dexter knew Borden would fly the country rather than allow the girl's name to be brought into the case. The trio of conspirators when faced with the facts finally confessed. It was shown that Dexter was in correspondence with Borden when he identied the unknown corpse as that of his cousin. While Borden is screened, the three to escape prosecution choose the alternative of expatriating themselves.

THE LITTLE MATCHMAKERS (April 13).—Margaret, the pretty school-mistress, and Joe, taking a "post" at the nearby college, are sweethearts. Margaret's little sister, Mildred, and Joe's brother Paul are likewise devoted, until the tragic day that Paul lifts Mildred's beloved bunny by the ears, and then all is over. Unfortunately Joe sees the new school principal escorting Margaret home, and the quarrel that ensues leaves Joe in possession of the ring that lately adorned Margaret's finger.

Mildred and Paul, heart-sick over the broken engagement, become friends and turn their combined efforts toward smoothing out the difficulties between Margaret and Joe. A comedy of errors follows that keeps everything lively for everybody until Paul is locked in the cloak-room by the teacher, just when, through the carelessness of the janitor, a fire starts in the cellar. Margaret's class responds to the alarm and show the efficiency of the fire-drill. It is not until the arrival of the fire department that Mildred misses Paul. She dashes into the school to free her chum. In the meantime he has broken out of the cloak-room and is groping toward the door. Joe runs to the fire. He is told by the panic-stricken Margaret that both children are in the burning school-house. Joe heroically rescues Paul and Mildred, who demand that he and Margaret "make-up," which the lovers wisely do.

RELIANCE.

HIS BACHELOR DINNER (April 12).—At Thornton's bachelor dinner, the unexpected arrival of an old friend makes thirteen at the table. While Thornton defies the superstition of the unlucky number as silly before his guests, subconsciously he carries the unfortunate impression to bed with him. Meanwhile, Edna Preston, his fiancee, has been entertaining some of her girl friends. Though she has no more dread of a welsh rarebit than Thornton has of thirteen, she has a curious feeling that she would rather not eat any of the chafing dish delicacy which her mother has prepared. However, she is persuaded to do so. That night Edna and Thornton have dreams—which are perturbing, to say the least. However, everything at last works out happily.

THE LIGHT IN THE WINDOW (April 16).—Roger Blake's chief interest in life is the bag of money he has hidden behind a loose brick in the fireplace. Although his son, Joe, works on his farm more faithfully than any hired man would, Blake refuses to pay him for his services, pointing out that he is given everything he needs. Joe, ashamed of his lack of pocket-money, determines to steal the money he feels is rightfully his. His father catches him in the act and turns him out of the house, in spite of the pleadings of his wife and daughter.

Joe finds work with a neighbor, but though he is now paid for his services, he is so homesick and wretched that he would gladly go back on the old basis if his father would forgive. Joe's sister promises to beg their father to let Joe return and to place a light in the window should he relent. The homesick boy creeps up to the gate of his home, but the light is never there.

One night two rowdies from the village plan to rob Blake. They enter the house after the family has retired. Blake is aroused, hurries to the sitting-room, but is quickly overcome by the thieves. In the struggle the bag falls and the money spills. One of the thieves places the lamp on the window sill to get light on the floor where the coins have been lost. Seeing the light in the window, Joe thinks it is the signal he has been waiting for and he hurries joyfully toward the house. After a desperate struggle, he gets the better of the thieves and has them locked up. Blake, who has long realized he was wrong, but has been too stubborn to give in, capitulates, owns that Joe was right and the prodigal is taken back to the bosom of the family.

GOD IS LOVE (Two parts—April 24).—Robt. Warren has been married just six years to Alice Blake when the story opens; they are rich but not happy. Mrs. Warren, an ardent worshipper at society's throne, cannot miss a party or gathering, and being a wonderful dancer, will sacrifice husband, home, and child, rather than miss a ball.

Virginia, the child, is ill. Mrs. Warren is at the ball, and the doctor advises sending for her. She refuses to leave her dances and returns home in the small hours of the morning. Robert is waiting for her and upbraids her for her lack of heart. They quarrel.

Losing his temper, he tells her to make her choice for all time between her home, husband and child, and her dances. She chooses her dances. Robert writes to his lawyer about the settlement for his wife. They part. Robert takes the child and starts for his western ranch. During the trip the child strolls away looking for her mamma. Robert is nearly insane at the loss and places his own life in danger, when after a thorough search through the train, he leaves the train while in motion and is found by the side of the track. A telegram is sent to his home, which brings his wife to Squaw Valley, near where they found him. She takes him back east, but nothing is heard of the child.

Dad Bartlett, an old recluse lives all alone in his little shack. The good minister tries to turn his thoughts to the hereafter, but only gets curses for his pains. He places a sign on his premises reading, "God is No Where—Ministers and Church People Keep Away." To this shack in the mountains Virginia wanders, telling the old man she is looking for her mamma. The old man keeps her and by the aid of the sign no one knows the child is there. Time passes. The old man loves the child devotedly, and the child loves her foster father. He has taught her to read and write and the sign now reads,—"God Is Now Here."

Robert and his wife are traveling to his western ranch, with Robert's young brother, an artist. They stop off at Crawley Junction, now the home of Virginia. Arthur sees the child and makes a pencil drawing of her, intending to paint it when he returns east. At the hotel he shows it to Warren and his wife; they recognize the child. Dad Bartlett gives her up, but spurns their gold. He begs the pencil drawing of Virginia. The Warrens return East with Virginia. The next day Dad is found by the minister dead on the floor, the pencilled drawing with these words in chalk underneath it, clasped in his arms, "God Is Love."

BEAUTY.

OH, DADDY! (April 20).—John and Jim are sons of Walter Hymens and their love for the bright lights and correct wearing apparel led them to plaguing their father for his simple life. "Be a sport and come to the dance," they tell him, but the middle-aged widower would only smile and bid them have a good time. However, it is destined that a handsome widow's smile is to bring the old man "back to life," but when the pretty Mrs. Valeria becomes the tenant of an adjoining house the up-to-the-minute sons do not take their Daddy into consideration as other than a "dead one." With only a slight acquaintance the two boys vie with each other for a smile or a look from the alluring widow.

While the boys are spending the wee hours of the night under the halo of the bright lights and Daddy has donned his pajamas and tucked himself in bed, from the house next door the screams of a woman pierce the stillness of the quiet suburban neighborhood. Valorous Daddy, clad only in his sleeping apparel, answers the call and the boys, returning home at this moment, see their father madly dashing into the home of the widow. Astounded, they, too, rush into the house and come upon the sight of the girl they love clad only in her night-dress swooning in the arms of their night-robed parent. Investigation proves that the cat had upset a costly vase in the parlor and the widow, being alone in the house, became hysterical at the thought of burglars. The boys breathe a sigh of relief when they know that their father was only answering a call for help.

In the morning the boys enter into a discussion as to which is the favored by the Atsco went into receivership, due to circumstances unavoidable by Mr. Anderson, he being an employee and not an officer of that company.

The Minusa Cine Products Company does not own the trademark "Radium," but manufactures, under Mr. Anderson's direction, the Minusa Gold Fibre Screen.

This screen has the advantage of many improvements by Mr. Anderson and Mr. Chas. Hetzel, former chemist of Atsco.

It is vastly superior to any other screen on the market.

widow's smiles, an argument which results in their clearing the library floor and fighting for the honor to succeed the departed Mr. Valeri. In the meantime the dark horse, having dreamed all night of the blue eyes, red lips and perfect figure of the night-attired vision of loveliness, unburdens his tale of love to the fair charmer and she, noting that a button is missing from his coat, succumbs to his plea, saying, "Well, you need some one to care for you and—and— I'm awfully lonesome." Joyfully, the happy couple hasten to inform the boys of their engagement and find them still fighting. Seeking the cause, the father is told that they are settling the question as to who is favored most by the lady in the doorway. Withholding his laughter, the old man very pompously shakes the hand of his future partner and bowing profusely, introduces the blushing widow as his future wife. The boys are dumfounded.

THE WISHING STONE (April 14).—Barbara Moore, a little girl, lives alone with her grandfather in a cabin on the edge of the forest. She meets Allan, the son of Mrs. Day, a wealthy widow. The children become firm friends. One day while playing they find a large stone which they pretend is a wishing stone. They both make the same wish—that they will marry each other. As the years pass, Allan leaves for school. Before leaving he makes Barbara promise to keep their wish. Barbara's grandfather dies, leaving her all alone. Allan's mother adopts her and learns to love her as a daughter. In later years when Allan returns from college, the promise made on the wishing stone becomes a reality.

THE CASTLE RANCH (Two Parts—April 19).—Lord Hickey, desirous of securing a country place for his second son, and not wanting to make the trip to America, buys the "Castle Ranch," which, from a photograph submitted by Jefferson Todd, a Montana land shark, represents a beautiful castle located in the midst of mountain grandure. Algy arrives with his portly man servant, Simpson, to take possession of his estate and at the depot buys as a curio (to send his mother) an Indian food bowl, offered for sale by Big Chief Bill of a nearby tribe. Directing Simpson to carry the purchase along with the other luggage, the poor servant, with trembling hands, complies, but thinks that his last days have come if he is compelled to stay in this savage country.

When Todd drives the new owner out to the property, Algy becomes aware that his father has been swindled. Castle Ranch is but a one-room shack with a high board front, painted to represent an imposing castle. Waiting to welcome their prospective neighbors are Sally Dunn, the object of Todd's affections, and her father. The polished manners of the handsome young Englishman make an impression on Sally at once and she is indignant at fraud imposed upon him, while Algy, attracted by the refreshing beauty of the western girl, decides that he will make the best of a poor bargain, for a while at least.

The castle having only two frail bunks, one on top of the other, Algy insists that the portly Simpson sleep outside. The trembling valet, his mind full of thoughts of savage Indians, rolls his night-robed body between a blanket on the ground, but being unable to sleep is startled by the form of Big Chief Bill, who, under sentence of death by the other members of his tribe, has come to search for the food bowl which he had stolen and sold to the Englishman.

Simpson, sure that his last hour has come, covers his head with the blanket and scarcely breathes. As Big Chief Bill stealthily enters the castle he secures the object of his search. The Indian having departed, Simpson steals into the upper bunk. In his sleep he dreams that he has been captured by savages and in his efforts to escape breaks through the frail bunk, falling on his sleeping master. In the morning Algy goes to the Dunn ranch for breakfast, where word is brought that oil has been discovered nearby. The news causes considerable excitement among the party, one of whom is Todd, who regrets that he did not purchase the property when offered a few days before.

After Algy returns to his own property he sends Simpson for water, who, seeing a black deposit on the surface of the spring, hurries to tell his master that the Indians have poisoned the supply. Todd and his secretary driving by offer to investigate and the land shark, realizing that the poison is oil, offers to buy back the property at the original purchase price, which is finally accepted by Algy. Meanwhile Sally hears of the prospective purchase from Todd's secretary and hastens to the castle to warn Algy not to sell, only to find that the two men had gone to make the deal legal. When the men return, Sally asks Algy if he was not aware that Simpson's discovery was oil and is both surprised and pleased when answered: "Why shouldn't I know? I put it there myself." At this statement Todd realizes that he has not only been beaten at his own game, but has lost all chance of winning Sally. Algy had gone him one better in the game of love also.

SHE WALKETH ALONE (April 21).—Rita Horton, a fashionable butterfly whose greatest affection is for her Pomeranian dog, becomes engaged to Loring Page, a young lawyer, through parental arrangements. During their engagement, young Loring, while on a vacation, meets Edith Evans and falls in love with her, but she rejects him, knowing his promised marriage to Rita. In due time Rita and Loring are married, but Rita continues to hold all else secondary to her affection for her dog, even to substitute a picture of herself with the little creature in her arms for a picture of her husband's, the favorite Madonna and Child.

At the death of her father, Edith Evans is left alone in the world and selects nursing as a vocation. In answer to an urgent call she is surprised to find that Loring is to be her patient, but as he is delirious she accepts the case. In Loring's delirium he talks only of a home and children, and Edith, seeing the photo of Rita and her poodle and later finding the discarded picture of the Madonna and Child, surmises the cause of his hallucinations. Leading Rita to the bedside of her delirious husband, Edith uses the two pictures as a test, leaving the hearer to judge her future course from the frenzied talk of the patient. When the crisis passes, Edith leaves the sick man before he recognizes her presence, and, as the time passes, she reads of the birth of a son to Mr. and Mrs. Loring Page. Knowing that she has nobly done her part to make the lives of husband and wife worth living, she goes away alone.

Luke thinks it over and decides to take the sheriff's advice. When the sheriff is able to travel but still weak from the wound, they start back. The proprietor of the mines, John Wesley, refuses to sign a new wage scale, and the men prepare to strike. Wesley hires as a spy among the miners, Guy Ford, who is also in love with Delia. Ford, in order to drive Denton out of town, places a note purporting to come from Wesley in Denton's pocket in which he is revealed as a secret spy of Wesley and the result is that Denton, because of Ford's treachery, is driven out of town. He goes back to his old position as Sergeant in the U. S. Army, and his aged mother is ministered to by Delia, who refuses to believe the story of her sweetheart's treachery. The miners strike and Denton returns to the colleries as a sergeant in the army. He practically deserts as he cannot fire on his old companions. The soldiers repulse the miners and the defeated miners gather on a siding to prevent the arrival of a train load of non-union men on which train is also Wesley and Ford. They escape in the melee. The miners follow the men and Wesley takes refuge in a deserted cabin. Marsden has also taken refuge in the cabin of Denton and there discovers Denton, who is with his mother and Delia. The men make up their quarrel and Marsden leaves on the horse of Denton as Denton undertakes to take him to a place of safety. They arrive at the cabin where Wesley is concealed and the old man, hearing the miners outside, agrees to sign the wage scale and the trouble is settled. Guy Ford meanwhile has seen Denton and Marsden enter the cabin and informs the soldiers whom he meets. They go to the cabin and there Wesley, in gratitude for Denton saving his life as Marsden was choking him, agrees to say that Denton came back there to protect him from the miners. Denton is accepted back into the troop, and the story ends with the departure of Denton on the troop train and Guy Ford is driven out of town.

(he) the pal, has disposed of the loot stolen by Norton for $235, and that the pal will forward the money as needed.

Jacob Ellis and his daughter, Jane, come to the town to do some trading and, through a village acquaintance, Norton is introduced to her. He tries to make an appointment with her and she tells him that she will see him at a country dance the following Tuesday night. Norton attends the dance, which is also attended by Jane, her sweetheart, Richard Bradley, a handsome, well-to-do young farmer, and others. Norton, having no other way to kill time, makes love to Jane and she grows to care for him. In love with Norton, she induces him to board at her father's farm. Norton, in answer to a previous letter, gets an answer from his pal that "Mother" Julia, a notorious woman of the underworld, will give Norton $500 if he will succeed in luring Jane to the city and into a life of white slavery. Pretending love for Jane, Norton courts her successfully. Ellis and his wife block the plan by refusing to give their consent to the marriage and lock Jane in her room nights. Distrusting banks, Ellis keeps his money hidden in the well. Norton accidentally discovers the hiding place of the money. He persuades Jane to elope with him that night. He steals the Ellis wallet and elopes with Jane in a horse and buggy.

On the way to the village where they intend taking the night train to the city, the horse becomes frightened at a piece of drifting paper and bolts, wrecking the buggy and throws them both out and into a deep ravine. Norton is killed in the wreck and Jane is knocked unconscious, but is not seriously hurt. Bradley, driving home from town, sees the runaway horse and investigates and finds Norton dead and Jane unconscious. He revives her and she finds the stolen wallet lying where it had fallen from Norton's pocket. They search Norton and find the incriminating letter and she realizes with horror what she has escaped. She makes up her quarrel with Bradley and he takes her home and restores the wallet to its hiding place. She gains her room unheard by her parents, who slumber on in ignorance of what has taken place. Her idol shattered, Jane tears up Norton's photo and kneels by her bed in a prayer of thanksgiving.

THE COST (Lariat—Two Parts—April 10).—Mong, in love with Myrtle, is jealous of Ralph, who cares for Myrtle also. Ralph receives a telegram from a moving picture company asking him to gather fifty cowboys together for a picture. He goes away to make arrangements, and while gone receives a letter from Myrtle complaining of Mong's jealousy and asking for assistance. Myrtle and Ralph meet and are married.

The moving picture company arrives and starts rehearsals when George Ralph's brother, intoxicated, breaks up the rehearsals and starts shooting. Myrtle interferes before Ralph can hurt his brother, but not before Ralph is injured. On his way to the doctor, he stops in the saloon, where Mong taunts him about his wife. Ralph shoots and kills Mong, and gets away.

Hidden in the house of a friend, he sends word to his brother, asking for an Indian disguise in which to escape across the border. George, responding to Ralph's request, goes to Ralph in the disguise, but he is tracked by detectives. Ralph and George escape from the detectives on a hand car. A SOUL'S TRAGEDY (Two Parts—Ideal—April 12).—Mavis Green is besieged with admirers, while Nell, her younger sister, who is deformed in body, but beautiful in soul, is neglected and overlooked. During an outing at the beach, their little sister, Clara, falls from a cliff into the sea. In a moment the crippled Nell is after her, but the waves prove too great for her feeble strength. She and the child are about to be lost when Carl Randall, the handsome and athletic suitor of Mavis, dives to their rescue and brings them both safely to shore. Shortly after this, Mavis and Carl announce their engagement. Poor Nell is broken hearted, as she realizes in her lonely soul that she loves Carl, who, in turn looks on her only with pity and kindness. In her unhappiness and isolation, the kindly vicar comes upon her, and reading her soul, tells her that when Nature takes away she also gives, and that great joy will come to her through unselfishness and the talents which she has not discovered in herself. She takes heart from the cleric's consolation, and amuses herself in painting pictures of children and animals.

In his chemical laboratory, Randall makes a mistake and in a second there is an explosion which renders him blind and deaf. Mavis shrinks from seeing him, and in his agony he calls for her in vain. Now the gentle Nell sees the opportunity God has given her to soothe the suffering of another, which she, and not Mavis, can understand. She goes to Carl, and he, thinking she is Mavis, is soothed and nursed back to health. With her meagre funds, Nell engages a specialist, and during the days while Randall is prepared for the operation which will give him back his health, hearing and sight, Mavis is playing the social butterfly. The operation over and successful, the hunchback steals away, returning with the now repentant Mavis and joins their hands together while Randall lies happy and secure in the belief that Mavis has been faithful. Happiness in her art and in her sacrifice gives a brighter vista to the life of the little hunchback.

IN DUTCH WITH A DUCHESS (Superba—April 13).—It is all arranged by the mother of "Sir Charles Kerplunk" that he shall marry "Emma." Emma proves not to his liking on first introduction, so Charlie runs out of the house and away from her as fast as he can. At the same time, in the great palace, the "Duke" is seen by one of the attendants dancing with one of the ladies-in-waiting. The attendant tells the Duchess, his wife, who rushes upon her fickle spouse, boxes the lady's ears and handles the Duke rather roughly.

In the meantime, Charles has been found and taken back to the house and Emma. He decides that he would rather die than marry her, so, taking a stout rope, he goes out into the orchard intent on committing suicide. He ties the rope around his neck, but is discovered by the persistent Emma before he has accomplished his purpose, and is taken back to the house and revived. Next day the Duchess decides to leave the Duke. She and her maid steal away to a boarding house which happens to be the identical one that Sir Charles and his valet have hit upon in their flight from Emma. She chooses a room next to the one in which Charles is hiding, and becomes so charmed by the music he is playing on the musical he has brought with him, that she sends for him. The Duchess and Sir Charles see much of each other and fall in love. At length the Duchess' maid goes back to the palace where the Duke is having a glorious time in his wife's absence, and discloses the Duchess' hiding place. The comedy ends with an extraordinary number of laughable situations and with the safe return of each of the runaways—the Duchess to her husband, the Duke, and Sir Charles to his mother and Emma.

BLAZING THE TRAIL (Premier—April 13).—Rodgers, an old forty-niner, learning of a gold strike in the hills, decides to make one last prospecting trip. Lillian, his daughter, begs to accompany him, and he finally grants her entreaties. They start off together in a prairie schooner, but not until Lillian has pledged herself to marry Fred, a suitor, on her return. Joe, a rival, hearing of Fred's success with Lillian, decides that he will have her at any cost, and starts out on horseback after the departing prospectors. Fred learns of Joe's threats and also follows. The prairie schooner has camped and the father has left for a bucket of fresh water when Joe arrives. Infuriated by Lillian's coolness to him, he ties her to the wagon, and is about to drive away with her when Fred arrives. A duel between the two men follows. In the meantime the horses, frightened by the confusion, run away and Lillian, since she is bound, is unable to stop them. To add to her danger, the wagon catches fire from Joe's carelessly dropped match, and soon the helpless girl is surrounded by flames. At the stream her father sees the runaway, and, getting a horse from a passing cowboy, follows. Lillian finally frees herself and jumps from the wagon, while Joe, seeing that Fred is fast gaining on him, swings to the limb of a tree and fires at his rival, wounding him. Fred finds Lillian, but the less fortunate rival falls in a gulley, in his attempt to get away, and is killed.

THE WINNING LOSER (Two Parts—Empress—April 14).—Marian Forrest, society reporter on the "Tribune," is sent to get particulars of the dance and reception held at the residence of Mrs. John B. Courtney. She calls while the dance is in progress and is given an interview by Jack Courtney, the son. The next morning Jack reads Marian's account of the dance in the paper and, recalling her attractiveness, writes a note asking her to go motoring. She gladly accepts and has to refuse an invitation to dine with him owing to an evening assignment. Next day Jack phones and promises her a "big story" providing she will dine with him that night. Her professional instinct is aroused and she accepts the invitation, but refuses to listen to his "big story," telling him that the man she marries must not be of the idle rich, but must "do something." In the morning papers Jack reads of the coming champion automobile speed race and decides to enter it. He purchases a new racing car. Jack, realizing that Dare will be his chief opponent, calls on him, telling him he is going to beat him and asking that he inspect his new car. While inspecting Jack's car, Dare decides that he must use foul play to win. He hires a man of questionable character, gives him a note to the manufacturers of Jack's car, requesting their permission for his mechanician to inspect the car, and signs the letter with Courtney's name. Permission is granted, the fake mechanician loosens the gasoline feed pipe and gets away. On the day of the race Marian goes to the telegraph office receiving reports of the progress of the race. Everything goes well with Jack until the work of the crook takes effect. Jack's car slows down and catches fire and he escapes just before the machine goes up in flames. Learning of the accident as it comes over the wire, Marian rushes to Jack's track quarters. Through the watchfulness of a little colored boy, Dare is proven guilty of his unscrupulous tactics and the honor of winning the race is taken from him. Marian tells Jack that even though he did not win the race, his attempt to "do something" has won her love, and Jack's disappointment at losing the trophy is more than recompensed by his great joy in winning Marian.

STUNG (Starlight—April 15).—Heinie and Louie, two old pals, find themselves alone in the world and stranded. Disheartened, they stride into the railway station where their eyes fall upon a man decked out with diamonds. Heinie and Louie think quickly; they decide to follow the illustrious gentleman with a view of parting him from his wealth. That night they stealthily enter the house they see him enter and suddenly come in contact with a large vase which falls and breaks. The count and his valet rush down and confront the two, who are all unnerved. Not desiring to be sent to jail, they pretend to be newspaper reporters. Through this medium Heinie and Louie find that the man they intended to rob is a count, who came to America for the purpose of marrying an heiress, whom the Count had never seen. The two friendly Dutchmen imprison the Count and his valet and decide to pose as the Count. Heinie and Louie call on the heiress and introduce themselves as "the Count and his noble friend." They are accorded a hearty welcome and the heiress falls a victim of love to the charms of the "pseudo count." But the real Count and his valet, whom Heinie and Louie thought safely imprisoned, free themselves with the aid of the famous police force and wend their hasty steps in the direction of the heiress' home, where Heinie and Louie are stopping. The real Count presents himself and a chase starts. Heinie and Louie, seeing that they are about to be caught, lock themselves in a box car and the chasing mob fall in a heap from exhaustion beside the passing train.

THE MISPLACED TWINS (Luna—April 15).—Jealous of the new twins who have come to take the place of supreme affection in their mother's heart, the three older children decide that they will smuggle the little intruders into a basket of clean clothes which the mother is sending home to its owner. They succeed with their plot, and the father, all unknown to himself, carries the babies away with the clean clothes on his shoulder. But the nearby saloon proves too tempting to pass unvisited. The father hides the basket containing the babies around the corner of the building and goes into the saloon to have a social glass with an old crony. Two boys playing marbles near by see him hide the basket, and full of mischief, decide they will play a prank on the man. In crossing the street with the basket they narrowly escape being run over by an auto, and in their attempt to get away from the machine they drop the basket in front of it. Babies, clothes and all are scattered into the street, but the twins escape injury. Two policemen witness the accident, and, learning from the boys that a man had hidden the basket, they go to the saloon and arrest the father as a kidnapper just as he is coming out. In the meantime, the mother discovers the absence of the twins, and, wild with anxiety, learns from the children that they have been sent away in the basket. She sends the boy to the home of the owner of the clean clothes, but he comes back with the report that the father has not yet arrived, whereupon the mother rushes to the saloon and is told by a bystander of the father's arrest. Hastening to the police station, she clasps the twins to her heart and pleads for her husband with such fervor that the police, after securing a solemn promise from the father that he will never drink again, discharge him. Mother and father take up the precious basket and start for their home. The closing scene is one week later, on father's pay day. Father's step is heard by the anxiously waiting family, the door is opened and father, a new man, enters, with the proud and manly air. He takes his wife and children in his arms, and turns over to them his week's pay envelope, proving to mother that the Supreme Intellect, in Whom she has always put her trust, has answered her prayers at last.

OYSTERS AND PEARLS (Empress—Comedy—April 16).—"Haystack Harry" finds fifty cents and goes to an oyster palace to replenish his long-suffering stomach. Fortune smiles when he discovers a hard substance in one of the oysters. Harry shows it to "Wandering Benny," his pal, who instantly recognizes it as a black pearl. They pawn it and see visions of meals for a week. Dennis Muldoon and his bride arrive at a hotel and while changing his clothes Dennis noticed that the black pearl from his stick pin is missing. Searching without avail, Dennis decides to advertise in the papers. Upon leaving the newspaper office, a woman persuades Muldoon to watch her boy while she hunts for her lost purse. Thinking of his bride, Muldoon hires a taxi and takes the boy back to the hotel, where his wife upbraids him for not telling her he had a son. The boy's mother returns, and not finding her son, calls a policeman, who finds one of Muldoon's calling cards. He locates Muldoon at the hotel and accompanies the mother there, where matters are patched up by the liberal use of greenbacks by Muldoon. The tramps see Muldoon's ad in the paper, but not having enough resources left to obtain their black pearl from pawn, are obliged to work in a cheese factory. They receive sufficient pay from this work, obtain their black pearl and hurry to Muldoon. He gladly gives them a check for $50. They immediately go to the oyster palace for more refreshment, and Muldoon's bride discovers the real pearl. A search for the tramps ends in their discovery in the oyster palace. Muldoon makes them return the check. The tramps are then forced to find another eating place.

IN THE BLOOD (Two Parts—Regent—April 17).—Bud Corday, a ne'er do well, tries once too often to pass some of the "queer" and is caught in the act—but narrowly escapes and has to hide from the police. In the meantime, Blanche, his little sister, decides to come to New York. A little schoolmate helps her out and she receives an engagement to dance in one of the leading theaters, where, through her phenomenal success, she meets the wealthy Harvey White. White wants to marry her. She refuses, thinking she will accept him a little later when her stage career is an assured matter. One day Blanche is invited to Harvey's home for the week end. Bud learns of the visit and decides to call on her there. Finding the guests all in the parlor busy, he goes upstairs where he steals a necklace and flees. The robbery is discovered shortly afterward and Blanche, being the only stranger, is suspected. Bud buys some fine clothes and calls on Blanche at the theater. While she dances she leaves Bud alone in her dressing room. He upsets the alcohol lamp and sets fire to the theater. Bud is carried to the hospital, fatally burned, where he writes a letter to Harvey telling him about the robbery. Harvey shows the letter to his father and insists that his father call on Blanche at once and apologize. He does this, and also invites her again to the villa to recuperate. Blanche accepts. While visiting Harvey she receives a telegram from the manager of the theater that he has canceled her engagements at his theater, whereupon Harvey induces Blanche to discontinue her stage career and marry at once.

THE COME-BACK (Premier—April 18).—The stage breaks down and little Janie, tired of sitting still, runs after a rabbit which she spies hopping by. She cannot catch the rabbit, but she stumbles over an old dinner bucket which she thinks must belong to the old miner who sits musing near her. She carries the pail to him, and he, wrapt in memories, tells the child the story of his life. "It was drink which made me forget my home, my wife,—everything that I possessed," he tells her. "One day I came home and found my wife gone—'left with a stranger,' they told me later. I have never seen her since." While the old man muses, Janie opens the dinner pail and finds in it a note. The miner reads. It is a note which his wife left him when she went away. It tells him that "the stranger" is her brother, and that she went only to return to him when he should settle down. The stage is at last repaired, and Janie's mother, seeing her with the miner, goes to them. When the miner looks up at her, he recognizes her for his wife. She points to Janie and says, "Your own child."

[The following are synopses of the pictures to be released on the Kriterion Program during the week of Monday, April 5 to Saturday April 10 inclusive.]

THE HERITAGE OF A CENTURY (Two Parts—Paragon).—Rodney Lane and Evelyn Gilbert are engaged to be married, but their happiness is blasted by a quarrel between their fathers, who take opposite views on a certain political question. In an outburst of temper, Sir Arthur Gilbert orders his one-time friend, Humphrey Lane and his son from his house forever. Evelyn is heartbroken at being separated from her lover, and soon succumbs to a serious illness. Unable to keep away from Evelyn, Rodney decides to shoulder his father's burden and try to patch matters between Sir Arthur and his father. On the day he calls to do so, Evelyn dies. Rodney denounces Sir Arthur for the narrow and bigoted way in which he sacrificed his daughter's happiness and life. Sir Arthur, in full realization of what his obstinacy has caused, sets down the whole occurrence on paper. He conceals the document in a secret niche in the great fireplace in the hall and then shoots himself.

Years pass by and another generation of Gilberts inhabit the hall. Sir Henry Gilbert is arranging the marriage of his daughter, Edythe, to William Hammond, a man of wealth and political promise. Edythe refuses to accept Hammond's attentions, saying she will marry Wilfred Arnold, whom she loves. Her father is furious and insists that she marry the man of his choice. Edythe and Wilfred plan to elope but they are frustrated by Hammond and Sir Henry, who force the girl to return home. Wilfred, in anger rushes into the room and confronts Sir Henry for desiring to force his daughter into a distasteful marriage and Sir Henry, speechless with rage, is about to rise and pronounce a curse on his daughter and Wilfred, when suddenly the old grandfather's clock strikes the hour of midnight. Spell-bound for an unaccountable reason, they silently watch the clock and from its body slowly emerges a vision of Sir Arthur Gilbert, his hand upraised in a stern rebuke. Slowly the vision moves toward the fireplace, taps on the cover of the niche, and gradually dissolves. Sir Henry discovers the hidden parchment, while Edythe and Wilfred eagerly lean over him, and read the story of the unhappy Evelyn and at the end, Sir Arthur's admonition: "The curse of the Gilberts is their temper and unforgiving pride. To him who can overcome, there is happiness assured." In his face a new light, in his eyes the request for forgiveness, Sir Henry gathers his daughter to him, while Wilfred grasps his outstretched hand, as a mutual understanding passes between them.

A FAMILY MIX-UP (Thistle).—Judge Rumple and Mrs. Newrich see each other for the first time at the railroad station as they are bidding farewell to their children, who are going to college. The Judge admires Mrs. Newrich and gladly seizes the opportunity which occurs the next day on the golf course to make her acquaintance. She poses as a "bachelor maid," and he, carried away by the spirit of the adventure, tells her he is a bachelor. Meanwhile their children have met in college and fallen in love with each other.

The judge and the widow are married, each concealing the fact that they have grown-up children. Much to their horror, they simultaneously receive letterts from their children, Frank and Rena, saying that they are coming home to spend their vacation. The couple arrive soon after the letters, and the judge quickly discharges the maid and puts Rena in her place, while his wife dresses up Frank as a butler. Complications naturally ensue when the judge sees his wife kiss Frank and matters are not helped any when she, in turn finds her husband and Rena in an affectionate attitude.

The result is a big family row which is only straightened out by the appearance of Frank and Rena who announce to their respective parents their decision to get married. Surprise is followed by joy and the family is happy again.

SHANGHAIED (Two Parts—Monty).—William, the younger son of Robert Grant, comes home intoxicated, and, during a quarrel that ensues, his father forces him out of the house. A short time later, while in a muddled condition of mind, William is shanghaied. Here he undergoes the physical pain of being "broke in" by a brutal Bucko Mate. As time passes and the wayward son fails to return home, the father regrets his hastiness, and the blind and deaf mother joins in his grief. Eventually the father dies, leaving a will to the effect that his estate is to be divided up between his two sons at such time when Harry, the elder son, shall find William and return him to his mother.

Harry gets into a conspiracy with his lawyer, and they hire a tramp to impersonate the missing son, groom him up presentably, and after rehearsing him in his part, he is brought in to the mother, who clasps him in her arms, thinking William has been restored to her. The next day the tramp is taken down to the lawyer's office by Harry, where the will is about to be executed when suddenly to their surprise, the derelict snatches the will and checks, covers the two with his gun and remarks that he will endeavor to right the crime which they are about to commit and search for the missing son himself. He departs, leaving them baffled.

Meanwhile the vessel with the shanghaied William is wrecked and he is washed ashore, where he is found and taken care of by a fisherman. He directs a letter home saying he is alive and will return home as soon as he is able. The letter is opened by Mrs. Grant's sister, who has just come from Canada, and whose suspicions have been aroused by the proceedings at the house. She hands the letter over to the derelict and he sets out to find William. He succeeds in bringing him back to his mother, who never knows of the deception played on her. His work done, ignoring the thanks showered on him, the tramp slowly walks out of the house to the railroad track and continues his lonely wanderings.

BILLY MAKES A BLUFF (Santa Barbara).—Billy's weekly salary amounts to $9.00 per week, but his tastes are those of a millionaire. He has never met his boss personally, but the boss has taken an interest in Billy from the good work he has done and decides to pay the young man a visit. Accordingly, Billy receives a letter telling him of his boss's intention. The millionaire accidentally drops the letter of introduction to Billy, which he had taken along, and it is picked up by a tramp who, after reading it, decides to impersonate the boss. He calls on Billy, presents the letter and Billy immediately treats him with his best cigars, drinks and makes his visitor perfectly at home. Then he suggests going out to a restaurant to dine, and, after phoning his sweetheart to meet him at the restaurant where he is going to have dinner with his boss, he and his guest depart.

Arriving at the restaurant, the tramp, delighted at his good fortune, proceeds to order up the best in the place. To Billy's dismay, he discovers that he hasn't enough to pay the bill, and just then the real boss, who has come in, seeing Billy's predicament, slips a $100 bill into his hand. The tramp, noticing this, immediately accuses Billy of having stolen the money from him and calls the police. The party is taken to the police court, where the millionaire discovers that Billy is the young chap he has been looking for, while Billy makes the startling discovery that the boss is none other than Betty's father. After seeing that the tramp gets all that is coming to him, they all leave the courtroom.

Shortly after Billy gets up courage to ask his boss for Betty's hand, which is granted together with a substantial check as a wedding gift.

THE COST (Santa Barbara —Two Parts).—John Vallance, manager of a bank, discovers that his cashier, Harry Barnes, has taken a large sum of money from the bank safe. He calls on Mrs. Barnes with whom he is in love, and offers her an alternative of either accepting his proposal or seeing her husband sent to jail. While she is pleading with him to spare her husband and clinging to his arm, her husband enters. His suspicions aroused, he draws his gun, but Vallance wrenches it away from him and leaves, with a final threat. Half crazed with jealousy and fear of the future, Harry is about to take his life but is prevented by Dora. She mixes him a drink containing an opiate, and he soon falls asleep under its influence. She goes to the telephone and, calling up Vallance, tells him she is coming to see him.

While Vallance is talking to Dora over the phone, his valet sees the safe door open and,

AIRDOMES

Owners of airdomes listen! Do you want the best patronage of your neighborhood? If you do, you will not use last year's sheet iron Screen. It looks pretty bad after the winter, with its bulges and dents and rusty spots. Even after giving it the "once over" with a coat of white paint, it won't do.

The best patronage of your neighborhood demands a Screen that not only gives them brilliantly clear pictures, but by that very brilliancy, enables you to commence your show two or three hours earlier every evening, or under proper conditions, to give it in the afternoon. Write and learn how this is done.

DAY AND NIGHT SCREENS, Inc.

taking out a bundle of money, hides it in his clothes, just as Vallance steps into the room. The valet takes the revolver (Harry's), which is lying on top of the safe, and shoots. Vallance drops dead. As the valet is leaving, he meets Dora at the door, and, seeing a chance to shift suspicion from himself, lets her in. Dora finds Vallance's dead body, and before she can get over the shock, the police arrive and arrest her on the valet's word that she was last with the dead man, and her handbag, Harry's gun, etc., are taken as evidence.

Harry awakens, finds the note his wife left and misconstrues the entire affair. Heartbroken, he takes the last train out of town. A lapse of ten years finds Harry in a mining town out West where he is known as the "copper king." The valet is running a gambling joint in the same town and Dora, discharged from prison, takes up work as a hospital nurse. The valet is wounded in a gambling row and is rescued from the burning mine in which he has taken refuge by Harry. Both men are severely burned and taken to the hospital and put in Dora's care. Here, the valet recognizes Dora and confesses. A happy reconciliation then takes place between the husband and wife.

A RUBE CONDUCTOR (Punchinello).—Two rubes arrive in the city. They meet two "sons of rest" who ask them for the price of a meal. Noticing the stocking in which the rubes keep their money, the two hoboes plan to steal it, but something in their faces arouse the rubes' suspicion and they leave hurriedly. They place the money in the grip, and set it down laughing at their narrow escape. The tramps are stealthily following and steal the grip at the first opportune moment. The rubes follow in a chase through the city but the tramps get away. Sadly the rubes return, and while strolling aimlessly through the park they meet a pretty girl. They both endeavor to outshine each other in winning the fair one's admiration, with the result that they soon get into a fight, and the sudden appearance of the girl's sweetheart adds to the trouble.

The rubes soon discover that they are broke and must look for work. They see an advertisement in the newspaper calling for motormen and conductors, and apply for the jobs. They are put to work on the same car, and while on duty, along comes the girl whom they had quarreled over. The conductor has the advantage, and makes himself agreeable, while the motorman nurses a secret rage. When the girl gets off, the conductor gallantly gets off, too, and assists her when suddenly the motorman puts on full speed, and the conductor is forced to run after the car. When he finally catches up with it, he and his one-time chum get into a fight. A policeman comes along and, fearing arrest, they throw him down and run. They finally land in a cellar where the two tramps have hidden to divide up the money, and in the scuffle that follows, the rubes succeed in getting back their belongings. As they walk off arm in arm, they swear in future no woman shall interfere with their friendship.

THE ACCUSING FINGER (Trump—Two Parts).—Two bank clerks are in love with the same girl, the daughter of their employer, but she favors the younger man, although she invites both to a party to be held at her home that evening.

When closing time arrives at the bank, the unsuccessful suitor sets the time-lock on the safe, so that it cannot be opened until eight forty-five next morning. He figures that if he can lock his rival in the safe overnight, by the morning he will be dead, leaving a clear path to the girl's affections. Through his anguished mind runs a series of thoughts in which the struggles of the imprisoned man and the accusing finger of the time-lock torture his conscience. In a vision he sees the supposed trial, conviction for murder and his step to the gallows.

He recovers himself in time before locking the safe door, and his rival comes out unsuspectingly, little dreaming of the fate which he had nearly met and the visions which had been taking place in his companion's mind during that short time.

A RAILROAD HOLDUP (Punchinello).—Tom Skinner gets in with a band of discontented workmen who plan to hold up the paytrain. During her canter through the woods, Mary (Skinner's young wife) overhears two men plotting the train holdup and rushes to the sheriff's office to report what she has heard. The sheriff is not in, so Mary leaves instructions on the slate, and hurries back to the scene of the intended holdup. She races along on the railroad tracks on a handcar, and flags the fast approaching train with her red skirt, bringing it to a stop in time.

The passengers alight, and the workmen discover the mistake they made in trying to hold up this particular train which happens to contain the traffic manager and the president of the road. The sheriff arrives with his men and while Mary is being made a heroine and complimented on her bravery by the president, she suddenly sees her husband among the men being led away, and is filled with dismay. The president insists on rewarding Mary, and she tells him the only reward she desires is the pardon of her husband. It is granted together with a substantial sum of money, and Mary and Tom go home, where Tom avows that he will live the life of a law-abiding citizen.

REFORMING THE OUTLAW (Alhambra—Two Parts).—Through his various misdeeds and daring holdups, Big Bill, the outlaw, has gained the name of "The Terror," and, although the sheriff has tried many times to capture him, his attempts have always proven fruitless. Bill's one friend is John, who drives the stagecoach to Long Dog and who had once befriended him; his bitterest enemy is "Tex," with whom he has had several encounters. The sheriff's sister, Helen, is on her way to visit her brother in Long Dog, when the coach is suddenly followed by a band of Indians. "The Terror," seeing his friend's predicament comes to his aid and helps fight the Redmen. Just then the posse, led by "Tex," on a search for the outlaw, passes by and Fate delivers Bill's enemies to the Redmen, between whom a battle takes place.

In the meantime Helen has climbed out of the coach in terror, and, discovering that the outlaw has been hurt quickly tears off her skirt and binds up her forehead. Helen arrives home safely, and from that day Bill is a persistent wooer. One day, while Helen is riding through the woods alone, she is stopped by Tex, who attempts to kiss her but the sudden appearance of "The Terror," with the aid of his revolver, soon sends the offender on his way, swearing vengeance on Bill. Helen then makes Bill promise never to shoot another man and to reform for her sake. He keeps his word, and, as time passes, secures work on Brown's ranch. In a few weeks he gains Helen's consent to marry him.

The wedding day arrives and all the boys are invited. As the minister utters the last words of the marriage ceremony Bill unfastens his revolver and hands it to his bride. Then the dancing commences, and Bill, who has never learned to dance, is a little jealous at seeing his wife snatched up by the cowboys. He goes outside the house for a second, when suddenly he is held up by "Tex," who has been waiting for him. Bill is in a bad fix, being unarmed, and the two men struggle for a hold on the revolver. They fall to the ground and it looks as though Bill is getting the worst end of the scrap when Helen comes out of the house looking for Bill to whom she intends returning his gun. Seeing his predicament, she shoots just as Tex pulls the trigger of the revolver, and in the scuffle he is killed.

Bill then takes Helen in his arms, assuring her that it was Tex's own shot that killed him. They then re-enter the house and join in the merrymaking.' A few years later we see them in their own home, "Terror, Jr.," seated on his daddy's knee playing with a toy rifle, much to the delight of his proud parents.

SYD, THE MASHER (Alhambra).—Syd and his chum, Add, are feeling rather gay and decide to take a little trip to the seashore, and give the girls there the "once over." After stealing a ride on a "jitney" auto-bus, they arrive on the beach and settle themselves on a convenient bench, when presently a flashily-dressed "chicken" passes by. Syd, with his most winning manner, goes up to her and asks her permission to share the bench with her. This granted, he gradually gets bolder, and finally tries to kiss her. Indignantly she turns around, lifts her veil and Syd finds he has been making love to a coon. She administers several hard wallops with her parasol and Syd rushes back to his friend, who is waiting for him.

They decide to try their luck elsewhere, and finally come upon an elderly gentleman and his daughter. Syd's efforts to flirt meet with no success, and finally the old man and his daughter get up and walk down to the beach, followed by Syd and Add. The girl's father meets a widow, and leaves the girl for a few minutes while he goes for a stroll. Add and Syd get an idea! While the father is away, Add gets behind the girl, and shoves her into the water; the next minute Syd jumps in and heroically "rescues" her. The father comes on the scene and showers Syd with thanks, while the girl falls in love with her brave "rescuer." Syd pretends not to know Add, who comes along waiting for an introduction, so Add gets another idea to win over the girl's father. He goes to where the widow is waiting and pushes her into the water, and is just about to rescue her, when Syd and the father come over and throw him into the ocean, leaving him to struggle for himself, while Syd jumps in and rescues the widow. While the girl's father is holding the widow in his arms and comforting her, Syd does likewise with the girl, while everybody forgets all about poor Add, who is sinking for the third time and finally disappears under the water.

SYD'S FINISH (On Same Reel As Foregoing).—While out for a ride in his new auto, his valet perched behind him holding a tiny sunshade over his head, Syd suddenly spies a frisky young "chicken" crossing the road, and invites her to get in for a spin. He is soon so engrossed in his fair companion that he doesn't notice his overcoat slip out of the car and fall on the railroad tracks. Sometime later, a cop passes and picks it up. Identifying it as Syd's, he brings it to Syd's wife and she thinks he has been killed, whereupon she immediately calls up her affinity and prepares to give a big party in celebration of the event.

Having stopped off for some refreshments, Syd is on his way back, when he meets the cop who tells him of the big doings at the house. Syd decides to surprise his wife. Stopping off at a costumer's, he soon emerges disguised with a little moustache and beard, and, accompanied by the "chicken," he enters his home while the party is at its height and discovers his wife seated on the lap of her affinity. This is too much for Syd, and with one bound he is on top of the "home-breaker." In the scuffle his false facial adornments are pulled off, and then Mrs. Syd gets busy with the "chicken." One of the guests, fearing a murder, calls the police, whose timely arrival soon breaks up the party and the disappointed guests, including the affinity and Syd's charming lady friend, all leave in a hurry.

Mrs. Syd then leads poor Syd out in the back yard, where she proceeds to duck his head several times in a big tub of water. Then she indignantly enters the house and locks the door, warning Syd never to dare come back again.

on earth is to repent. The fact that repentance must follow Sin, doesn't in the least effect the benign clarity of his vision. But the Life Force mocks his mummery, and by stealth his daughter marries the man of her choice—a husband rich and devoted. But now her early life of restriction has festered into an insatiable desire for the sweets of life, and she dances with Folly in a mad and ever madder swirl. Her husband wants children, but he gets dinner parties—dances—more dances—and all the rest of the flitting phantom life of Society.

And then through a curious circumstance, she becomes imbued with a desire for motherhood. But here the God of Compensation steps derisively between her and her obsession. A fall necessitating an operation leaves her incapable of becoming a mother. Who Pays?

HIS FRIEND—THE CAPTAIN—April 12-17).—When Caper, senior, learns of the nightly orgies of his son, Billy, he threatens to cut off his allowance as a penalty. Billy promises to reform, but his thirst is stronger than his vows, the consequence of which is that he lands home pretty well "lit" and brings with him Thirsty Nat, a tramp whom he picks up in a cafe. Billy realizes that his goose will be cooked if his father hears of his latest escapade so he decides to pass Nat off as "Captain Braggert," a valiant soldier whom his father is expecting. Luckily Billy's father never met the captain so when Nat is dressed up in Billy's regimentals, the old gent falls for the deception. From that moment things begin to happen. The carnage that follows would make a battle ground look like a picnic garden. There is no telling where it will end until the real captain appears on the scene. And then—well Billy and Nat decide that the climate has suddenly grown too hot for them and they proceed to make themselves scarce.

ASHES OF DREAMS (April 12-17).—All the world seem glad to John Greason when his sweetheart, Alma Reeves, whispers the magic "yes." Straightway they confide the glad news to Alma's parents, who add their blessings and well wishes. A shadow of sadness enters both young lives when John leaves for the West to make his fortune. Arriving there, John, inspired by his love, soon proves his worth and after meeting with success sends for Alma to join him. Then come glad days of expectation and preparation. All the town knows John and his romance and when the day of Alma's arrival comes, a goodly array of friendly cowboys go with him to the station. But fate rides on the train with Alma. The train is wrecked and her young life goes out. The news is broken to John, waiting at the station. Bereft of his reason by the terrible shock, John is led away by his sympathetic friends, back to his little cabin. Daily thereafter for many weeks the racked lover makes his pilgrimage to the station eager to catch the first glimpse of his beloved Alma. A merciful death, with its soothing touch, ends the futile longings of the faithful lover.

SUGAR CULTURE (Java)—Educational Subject—April 12-17).—This picture which graphically shows the evolution of one of the staple articles of our food, is one that will interest anyone. He need not be a student of science to easily grasp the process of sugar-making as it is unfolded step by step from the time the seed is planted until, as the finished product, it is shipped to the various markets. The raising of sugar-cane and the manufacture of sugar is one of the biggest and most profitable industries of Java, forty thousand tons being the annual export. It is just these films that are looked for by the moving picture adherents. They realize that the pictures, together with the lucid titles, give one an insight into a subject which would otherwise need hours of research.

PICTURESQUE FRANCE (Grand Morin) (On same Reel as Foregoing—April 12-17).—Another one of those suberbly colored travel pictures which have such a strong appeal to the picture fan. Numerous views of the Grand Morin are shown as it peacefully wends its way through dense foliage which lines its course. Houses of quaint and cozy design, clustered along the banks of the river, vie with Nature herself for beauty and charm.

THE UNWELCOME WIFE (Five Parts).—Blanche Scott, an actress of fame, married to a rich lawyer, Martin Scott, are living happily in New York, Blanche has a cousin, Elsie, who is married to Frank Edmonds, a performer, who mars her happiness, through infidelity. Blanche invites Elsie to stay with her, and induces her husband to procure a divorce for Elsie. George Moore, Blanche's grandfather, who is blind, lives with them. Previous to her marriage to Scott, Blanche met with an automobile accident, in which both of her parents were killed, and from the shock she became mentally deranged, but shortly afterward recovered. At the birth of Blanche's first child, Viola, her attack of insanity returns. Physicians declare her case hopeless, and she is confined to an asylum. Her cousin Elsie adopts Viola.

Two years elapse and Blanche is still at the asylum. Elsie has, in the meantime, secured a divorce from her husband. During this time Scott makes advances to Elsie, but is repulsed. Scott's love for Elsie prompts him to bring suit for an annulment of his marriage to Blanche on the ground of her being insane prior to his marriage, and he succeeds in having his marriage annulled. Blanche, in her hallucinations, raves both of her child and of her past successes on the stage, and very often sees herself playing her favorite roles of various classic plays, in which she starred. Scott, assuring Elsie that Blanche's condition is hopeless, is successful in winning Elsie's love and, in due course of time, they are married. A year later Elsie gives birth to a boy. All are overjoyed, except the blind grandfather, who still lives with Scott. The moral wrong, though legally done to his grandchild Blanche rends his heart with sorrow.

Six years later: All are living happily, having forgotten the past. One day Scott receives a letter from the superintendent of the asylum, notifying him that Blanche has unexpectedly recovered and is in a condition to be taken home. Scott shows the letter to Elsie, who insists that he bring Blanche back. Scott refuses, but Elsie fervently pleads with her husband to gratify her wish. He still remains obdurate. Moore, overhearing Elsie's plea, cautions Scott not to tell anything to Blanche for the time being, as it may cause a relapse. Scott, convinced by the prudent advice of the blind old man and Elsie's pathetic appeal, finally yields and brings Blanche home. Blanche's joy upon her return is somewhat dampened by the coolness of her former husband. She suspects that there is some secret in the house, and questions Scott, Elsie, her blind grandfather, and the servants, but gets no satisfactory reply. Baffled in her efforts she at last questions her own eight-year-old child, Viola, and from her she finally learns the truth.

Elsie, wishing to sacrifice her own happiness for Blanche, decides to go away with her child, Eddie, but Blanche, realizing that she cannot live under the same roof with her former husband, prevents Elsie from leaving. The ex-wife then seizes a knife near at hand and attempts to cut her throat, but is prevented by Scott and Elsie. The furious rage and wild excitement again disturb her mental balance, and she is pronounced incurably insane. Blanche, while being led to the ambulance, wildly calls for her child. Moore, sunk in unutterable grief, goes to her, but his suffering is beyond human endurance. He is overcome by his emotions, stricken with heart failure and dies. Blanche, seeing him fall, breaks loose from the physicians and rushes madly to the prostrate form of her grandfather, kneels over him, imagines that she performs the scene of LaTosca, where she kills the Baron and laughs hysterically.

THE MAGIC BOTTLE (World Comedy Stars—April 5).—Bender and his friend, the Widow Templeton, decide that bachelor life does not agree with Jenkins, consequently they search for a wife. When Jenkins sees the widow, however, all thoughts of any other flee, and he immediately proceeds to win her. Angered by this, Bender resolves to "get even," and presents the newly-married couple with a bottle of water, telling them that it will change color in the event of either one digressing from the path of fidelity.

While traveling, Jenkins is attracted to a flashy young lady on the train. As they pass through a dark tunney, he kisses her. Meanwhile, Bender has persuaded the wife to accompany him to dinner. He bores her with his advances. Later Bender pours ink in the clear water of the magic bottle, which is discovered first by Jenkins, who is panic-stricken. He tries to conceal the supposed symbol of his perfidy, but is interrupted and places the bottle back in the cupboard. His wife finds the blackened water next and also wants to conceal it. There is no place to pour the water save in Bender's high hat. Then she refills the bottle with clear water. Bender lingers to see the result of his plot and is surprised that things turn out all right. He puts on his hat to leave, and the inky water drenches him.

OPENED BY MISTAKE (World Comedy Stars—April 12).—Phillip Page, a famous author, is unable to write a successful story unless he uses the backs of envelopes, which he has cut open himself. After his marriage, he is ashamed to tell his wife his weakness, and when he receives an order from his publisher to write a best seller, he locks himself in a room to begin the novel. His wife, anticipating his comfort, has stocked the room with pens, ink and nne white paper, but no envelopes. Page is unable to write on the good paper and, not wanting to confess to his wife, begins opening the mail that comes to the house, addressing hundreds of letters to himself to replete the dearth in envelopes.

His wife learns of these actions and fears that he has gone mad. She sends for an alienist, who writes that he will call at three o'clock. Page opens this letter by mistake, and, thinking it to be from an admirer, decides to investigate. When he goes on watch at three o'clock and discovers an inoffensive messenger boy bringing his wife's shoes, he starts things.

The alienist appears and a lively time ensues. Page is captured and bound, and the doctor concludes that he is the victim of a mental malady. It is some time before Page is able to explain and is released.

Carl and Alice are lovers. His employer, Director Bergh, witnesses a love scene between the two in the college. He dismisses Carl and informs the father of Alice of her love affair. The banker warns Alice that she must not see Winters again. The girl assures her father of Carl's honorable intentions and pleads to have him grant Winters an interview. The banker refuses. The girl tells Carl what has happened and that her father will leave the city with her for a long period. Carl asks her to become his wife. She consents and they are married. When Alice tells her father of her marriage, he orders her from his home.

Carl and Alice spends their honeymoon in Carl's boarding house. Carl accepts an offer to become musical director in Rio De Janerio. Alice promises to join him there as soon as he is established. Several months pass. The banker learns that his daughter is to become a mother. Mr. Winthrop goes to her and persuades her to return to his home. Alice, in her correspondence with her husband, has not told him of her secret so as to cause him no worry in his new position. Winthrop in his hatred for Carl intercepts and destroys the letters and cables which the husband and wife send to each other.

Carl has met with success in his new position but is distressed at receiving no news from his wife. A daughter is born to Alice, who died from septic poisoning. Carl, alarmed by his wife's silence, resolves to return and to bring his wife back with him. Before his departure he receives a cable from her father announcing the death of his daughter, Carl's wife. After a long illness, Carl leaves the hospital, friendless and disheartened. He earns a livelihood singing in amusement places, accompanied by a harp player, a faithful fellow, devoted to Carl, his teacher.

Years have gone by and Carl's daughter, of whose existence he has been kept ignorant, is now a girl of seventeen years. Her father in South America has become gray and old and is making a living as a street singer. His wish is to visit the grave of his wife and he returns with his harpist to New York. One day his daughter while out riding is attracted by the sounds of music. She speaks to the singer and invites him to come to her home the next day, which is her birthday, to play and sing for her. Carl consents. Carl and the harpist go to the Winthrop home and he sings for the young girl, whose identity is unknown to him, the song he had often sung for his wife for whom he composed it.

The girl goes to dress for dinner, asking Carl to continue the song. He sees a photograph. It is the portrait of his wife. The banker enters and accuses Carl and the harpist of being impostors and thieves. Carl learns from Winthrop that the young girl is the child of Winthrop's daughter—Carl's own child; Winthrop orders Carl from the house when Carl tells him that he is the father of the girl! The banker offers Carl money to conceal his identity. Carl refuses the money, but resolves to go out of his daughter's life to preserve her happiness. After a final meeting with his daughter, he is about to leave the house when the banker, filled with remorse, tells his grandchild, "Alice, this man is your father. You must honor thy father and thy mother, so sayeth the Fifth Commandment." The story ends with father and daughter embracing, the banker asking Carl's forgiveness.

Enthusiastic over Selma's rare beauty, her latest admirer suggests a game of cards, the stake to be Selma herself. The winner to accompany her to her home. Disgusted at the affair, Selma flees, but is followed by "Young Spendthrift," the winner. "Spendthrift" offers Selma large sums of money, but to no avail. Selma letcures "Spendthrift" and tells him that if she had had his opportunities in life she would have accomplished things instead of being the "sort of woman she is."

Struck with an inspiration, "Spendthrift" decides to give her a chance, and presents her with $100,000. Later, "Wealth," father-in-law of Selma's former lover, covets the fortune of 'Spendthrift" and uses the artist to secure his end. "Spendthrift" is ruined. Selma, in the meantime has devoted her money and time to creating a hospital for the care of abandoned children. Visiting among the poor families takes much of Selma's time. "Spendthrift," learning that the artist was responsible for his downfall, as well as Selma's, plots revenge, and with this end in view invites all his friends to see him bury his past life. The artist comes to the affair with "Spendthrift," becomes intoxicated and at the end the two lie down to sleep off the stupor. "Wealth" then appears, tirades against the artist's actions and the treatment by him of his ("Wealth's") daughter, while "Spendthrift," in the throes of a drug passion—well, see the rest of this allegorical subject to learn its ending.

THE SHADOWS OF A GREAT CITY (Popular Players—April 5).—A young profligate son of a wealthy merchant falls in love with the daughter of an inventor, who has devoted the best years of his life to perfecting the machinery of his employer's plants.

After an accident has caused the death of the inventor, the merchant, none too scrupulous, lays claim to an unpatented invention. Not aware of his father's acts, the merchant's son is courting the inventor's daughter—but parental opposition is interposed. Offering his son a half interest in his business if he will renounce his love for the girl, the father is dumbfounded when his son refuses and decides he wants the girl more than the money. Ordered from home, the son secures a job as stevedore on the docks. The foreman takes a dislike to the boy and tries to browbeat him. After a quarrel, the boy accidentally pushes the foreman into the river—runs away and tells his sweetheart that he has committed murder. PROHIBITION (Prologue and Five Parts).—Lemuel Larkin, a breeder of race horses, is addicted to the drink habit. His first child, a son named Richard, inherits his father's appetite for drink, while his brother Ben, born a year later, takes after the mother and escapes the inherited curse. The boys grow up to love Hattie Holmes, a neighbor girl, raised by a Puritanical aunt, who abhors drink. Hattie tells Dick, whom she chooses in preference to Ben, that she will break their engagement if he ever takes a drink. Ben, who overhears her remark, becomes mad with jealousy and begins to tempt his brother, and in various ways to feed Dick's natural appetite for alcohol. Dick, realizing the fact that if he is to win the hand of Hattie, obtains a prescription from his doctor which he thinks will cure him of the desire for drink.

Ben persuades his brother to allow him to take his (Dick's) medicine home and after pouring out part of it he fills up the bottle with whiskey. Dick is about to call on his fiance when he is reminded by his brother to take his medicine. The result is that the girl smells whiskey on his breath and a quarrel starts. Not being able to win his point, Ben seeks to harm his brother physically by preparing the sulky for a breakdown which Dick is to drive. In this he partly succeeds. Ben is discovered by Hattie attempting to force Dick to drink while semi-conscious from the fall. Hattie starts to fight with Ben. The noise brings the whole household to her assistance.

Fearing he is to lose the hand of Hattie, whom he is making a fiendish struggle to win, Ben connives to get Dick intoxicated again. He transfers their father's wallet from the latter's pocket to Dick's. It is found there by the father, with Ben's assistance, and Dick is sharply reprimanded by his parent. Ben lures Dick to a cabin in the woods, where he immediately begins to get him drunk with whiskey. Suddenly Dick realizes the fiendish treatment he has been subjected to by his brother and becomes angry. A fight starts in which Ben is nearly killed, and Dick is tried for attempted manslaughter. Dick is successfully defended by Lawyer William Irving, who becomes a victim of drink and sinks to the depths of degradation. Later he reforms and again is a successful lawyer. He becomes a congressman and teaches the lesson of the benefits of sobriety.

Despite the seemingly superhuman efforts of Ben to separate Hattie and Dick, they are eventually married; but that doesn't stop Ben couple. The execution of the diabolical plot in his devilish plans to separate the young is attended by results which make scenes and situations that dig into the human heart and present the multitudinous evils consequent upon drink. Ben is finally chased from the house when his diary is found explaining his numerous attempts to have the happy couple divorced. Hattie is about to become a mother, and, believing in prenatal influence, determines that her offspring shall not inherit the family curse, so she spends several hours each day looking at and handling pure clear water, thus succeeding in her heart's desire.

The octopus of alcohol; the birth of the Saviour, and the multitude of events coherently successive in this photoplay, are too numerous to mention in a synopsis.

THE BRIDGE OF SIGHS (Four Parts).—The story opens with a prologue. In the prologue Jeff Davis meets a young fellow named Bill Stevens, who is beating his way to New York City. In the story proper, to New York City comes this young fellow. In another part of the city at the same time a beautiful young girl, Millie Browning by name, is anxiously trying to get employment. Her mother is sick. She is threatened with eviction for non-payment of rent. Accidentally, Stevens meets Tom Carroll, a yeggman. He needs a partner to help him in the job he has that night. Stevens is discouraged and listens to the yegg and is almost on the verge of accepting his proposition when Jeff Davis arrives on the scene. Jeff recognizes the yegg, a notorious character, and also Stevens, the young fellow he met on his way to New York. Jeff tells Stevens he is in bad company, and on the road to the "Bridge of Sighs," so Stevens promises to stick to his search for honest work and to come to the Hotel de Gink if he fails.

Meanwhile the yegg meets Millie Browning, and follows her from place to place as she seeks work. He follows her home, as he figures that she is hopelessly down and out and that she should be easy prey. Carroll sees her coming out and inquires for a mythical tenant of the house. He offers her work and conducts her to his headquarters, the back room of a saloon. Stevens, who has secured a job as porter in this saloon, sees the yegg with this beautiful young girl. Stevens is amazed to see an innocent young girl with the yegg. The yegg tells the young girl he is a detective, and the employment he has for her is as his assistant. She accepts the job, and he tells her it is absolutely necessary for her to disguise as a boy. The girl agrees to wear boy's clothes. That night she arrives at the saloon disguised as a boy. Stevens meets her. His desire is to save the girl. She tells him she must have money, and tells him why. He promises to help her and she believes him.

The yegg hears what Stevens said to the girl and puts up a job to send Stevens to the penitentiary. With another crook he plans to rob a safe and have Stevens caught in the act, but the timely arrival of Jeff Davis, "King of Hoboes," from the Hotel de Gink, saves Stevens from his first step in crime. After a number of sensational scenes, including a terrific struggle with the crooks and police, the story ends at the Hotel de Gink, where young Stevens and the girl see the sunshine of the future.

[Note: The Hotel de Gink, New York City, is an institution established by Jeff Davis, as a home for the unemployed. "The Bridge of Sighs" is a passageway above the street, connecting the Criminal Court with the Tombs. Convicted criminals and murderers cross the "Bridge of Sighs" on their way to the Tombs.]

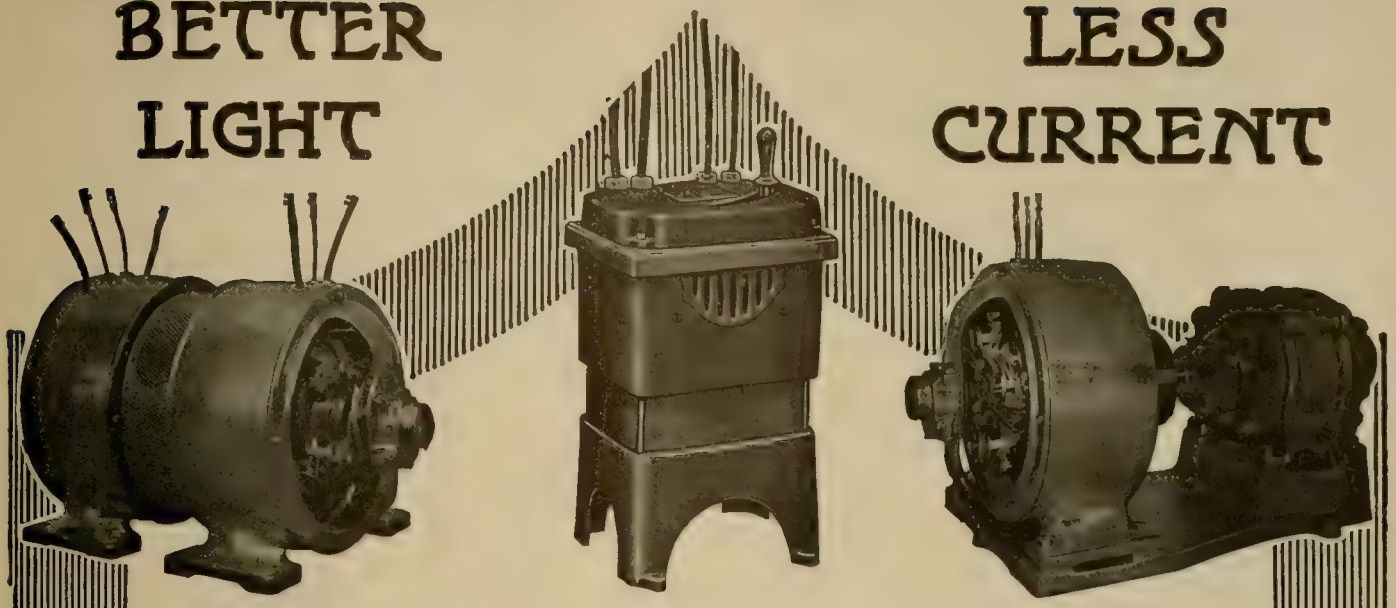
BETTER LIGHT LESS CURRENT



The DC Compensarc lowers the voltage of a direct current supply to that required at the lamp without needless waste.

The AC Compensarc cuts ⅔ from your lighting bill if you use alternating current.

The AC to DC Compensarc will transform alternating into direct current and reduce the voltage at the same time without needless waste.

No matter what current you have---Alternating or Direct---or what voltage or frequency, one of the will enable you to secure a light that will give those clear, bright pictures that everybody now demands.

What's the use of paying extra money for special screens, projecting machines, and first run films and then spoil the whole result with poor light? With the Fort Wayne Compensarcs you can get any kind of light you want regardless of the kind or quality of your current supply.

The Compensarcs will give you

STEADY LIGHT. No flickering, no sputtering, even when changing intensities or from one machine to another.

WHITE LIGHT. No yellow streaks, no ghosts.

BRIGHT LIGHT. Three times the light with two-thirds the current.

They are safe, efficient, easy to operate, fool proof and reliable.

Mr. G. R. Scott,
General Electric Co.,
Duluth, Minn.

Dear Sir:-

As per your request while in the city some time ago, I have had a picture taken of the operating room, and am sending you one under separate cover by mail today.

You will notice that the switchboard does not show on the picture due to the fact that the camera was located near the switchboard so as to get a good view of the rectifier.

This rectifier has been in operation for nearly four years, and has at no time given us any trouble for the small fraction of a second during any show since its installation. The same tube is being used today that came with the machine, and is in as good condition as when it was installed. It starts as readily as would a new tube.

As far as our pictures are concerned, they speak for themselves, and are equal to any ever put on a screen anywhere on earth. The above statement can best be verified by yourself as far as the picture end of it goes.

With best wishes and success,

Very truly yours,

Gus Johnson

FLASH!

Sam once had a small haberdasher's shop in a newly settled and thriving little town. He had no competition, so he decided to get all the profit he could out of the business while the getting was good.

Sam bought a lot of odds and ends that had a "flash." These were cheaper than standard lines and had the appearance of being as good. The quality in them was negligible. The townspeople complained, but they bought from Sam anyway because they had no other place to go for the needed wear.

A big factory concluded to locate in the town. Bill heard about it. He wanted to go into business there, too, so he looked over the ground. He sized up the situation immediately and decided to start a shop in competition to Sam's.

In a few weeks Bill opened his new establishment. He put in nothing but standard lines of haberdashery that gave the purchaser full value for his money. Using the opposite of Sam's method, Bill's innovation was a success from the jump. As the town grew Bill's business moved along with it.

In the meantime Sam kept his shop open, but the returns were almost nil. He retained some customers, to be sure, but these were either too lazy to try to get value for every dollar they spent, or they were too ignorant to take advantage of a good thing. Sam saw Bill become rich while his own bank balance never increased.

The incident is exactly like the motion picture business. Its development is parallel to the growth of the thriving little town. It offered opportunities to the first exhibitor as the new town did to the first haberdasher.

Sam was the first exhibitor. He held to cheap pictures that had only a "flash" to recommend them because he considered it economy! Then when Bill got into the game with standard quality pictures, Sam watched the newcomer wax prosperous.

Mina comedies are of standard quality. They breathe only quality born of the work of artists; solid comedy is the result. No beaten path is followed; flashiness is no part in or of them. Yet to have them in your program—your stock in trade—costs no more than the ordinary comic picture, so called. Insist upon getting them from your licensed exchange.

MOTION PICTURE MAILING LIST SERVICE TALKS

CIRCULARIZING vs. ADVERTISING

Both are equally necessary if satisfactory results are to be obtained. Advertising assists in establishing prestige and produces "prospects," but needs to be supplemented with circularizing campaigns if maximum results are to be obtained.

In circularizing, care should be taken that the list used is complete and free from duplicates, "dead" and fictitious names. In addressing, the name of the exhibitor should be included.

MAILING LIST COST vs. WASTE

Why circularize 20,000 theatres in covering the U. S. when there are less than 17,000? If you have a list, I shall be glad to assist you in analyzing it. Our list is corrected daily, to keep it up-to-date, and our charges are extremely moderate, particularly when the saving of postage, etc., is considered. Shall be glad to have you consult me. "It's San Francisco!"

Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America to Hold Fifth Annual Convention in SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA!

JULY 13th TO 16th, INCLUSIVE!

Exhibitors and Manufacturers Overwhelmingly Favor Selection of the Coast City!

Conditions Concerning Selection of San Francisco Best Set Forth in the Following Letter from National President Pearce:

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

MARION S. PEARCE, Baltimore, Md.

First Vice-President
T. P. FINNEGAN, Dallas, Tex.

Second Vice-President
MARK E. CORY, San Francisco, Cal.

Secretary
W. R. WILSON, Columbus, Ohio

Treasurer
PETER J. JEUP, Detroit, Mich.

Office of the National President, Baltimore, Md.
March 30th, 1915.

TO THE MOTION PICTURE INDUSTRY OF AMERICA.

Gentlemen:

In December last, I sent a communication to the Manufacturers, asking their opinion as to the city in which the next Annual Convention should be held. They were almost unanimous in their choice of San Francisco!

Being equally anxious to hear from the Exhibitors, to get their views on the same point, a coupon was recently published in the various Trade Journals, giving each Exhibitor an opportunity to name his choice of a city for the Convention.

Except for the smallest number imaginable, they voted for San Francisco, and I want to express the sincere appreciation of the M. P. E. L. of A. to both Exhibitors and Manufacturers for their promptness in making known their choice.

I had hoped to make a personal reply to each and every one from whom we heard on the point, but when the replies increased, till they got into the thousands, this was simply a physical impossibility, and I am taking this means to attain the same end.

Full and complete arrangements for the convenience and comfort of every Exhibitor attending will be made in due time. This entire matter will be in the hands of a Committee from the San Francisco League, of which Mr. M. E. Cory, the Second National Vice-President, will be the Chairman.

Pending the time when more detailed arrangements can be made, let each man at least make up his mind to be present at this Convention, unquestionably the most enjoyable and really beneficial the League has ever held.

Very truly yours,
MARION S. PEARCE,
Nat'l Pres. M. P. E. L. of A.

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

How to Make Money

by Lewis J. Selznick

No. 13

This series of articles is planned to make money for you—to show you why my ideas have succeeded—and why they will succeed for you if you will weigh each one carefully. Some of them will sound egotistical. I want them to—it's the only way I can drive home my arguments.

Marcus Loew Is Buying Second Runs

On October 31, 1914, I said that second runs were as valuable as first—and sometimes more valuable. The Moving Picture World thought the idea of enough importance to give it a page. But it was early—new—different—and so it was pooh-poohed like most of the new ideas that I have formulated.

But here comes the biggest brain in popular priced entertainment with the announcement that he will run World Features in all his theatres beginning with the OLDEST FEATURES FIRST.

In spite of the thousands of theatres in which these films have been run Marcus Loew believes that the advertising these plays have had and the mouth to mouth recommendation of people who have seen and enjoyed them will mean MORE business for him instead of less.

I have advocated this idea for a long time, and it is taking hold now because it is a money making idea—a sensible, logical business move.

It is the same idea that I have advocated—that features should be run three days to a week and that exhibitors who will follow out that policy and advertise their plays will MAKE MORE MONEY, and build a better profit paying business than the one day run for big pictures.

As a further evidence, Mr. Landau, Manager of the Heights Theatre, at 181st Street and Wadsworth Avenue, wrote us that on April 8th, he ran "The Lure," a picture eight months old, and that it brought him the biggest crowd that he had for months, and that it made the most money for him.

Mr. Landau is one of the keen present-day exhibitors and his theatre reflects the man. All this bears out what I have said, and say AGAIN—good pictures will draw the crowd and make money whether they are first run or not.

Money

YOU can read yourself black in the face about what many of the so-called premier features? ? ? ? have done in the way of bringing home the money for Exhibitors, but if you want facts, GENUINE FACTS, from the biggest Concern in the Universe, Hearken, Comrade, to what follows in this advertisement. When you boil down the proposition of FEATURES, there's only one thing that cuts any ice with Exhibitors, and that's the KALE—DOUGH—GREENBACKS—MONEY—SHEKELS or whatever else you want to call the elusive American Dollar. Claims fall flat alongside of actual results, so if you want money, —and if,—

The Williamson Submarine Moving Pictures Are Drawing Capacity Houses Everywhere

JUST the minute the Educational, Scientific and Theatrical world received the news that The Williamson Bros. had accomplished the unbelievable,—that of exploring the bed of the ocean and making moving pictures at the bottom of the sea,—the whole show world went crazy to get these films. The Williamson Bros. had accomplished something absolutely and positively unheard of in the history of the human race—MOVING PICTURES AT THE BOTTOM OF THE SEA. The minute data was obtained from the Williamson Bros., such mighty publications as The Scientific American—The American Magazine—Country Life in America—Citizens Magazine—Literary Digest—Collier's—Popular Electricity—London News—Popular Mechanics—Photo-play Magazine—L'Illustration of Paris—New York World—Chicago Tribune—New York Telegraph—New York Sun and hundreds upon hundreds of other publications throughout the entire civilized world, printed thousands upon thousands of columns of straight publicity matter that no living soul could buy for money. matter, NOT advertising matter, GET THAT? What other film feature ever received such endorsement, what other feature was ever played up one ten-thousandth part as strong? You can't name one. What more valuable help to thousands of Exhibitors could anything be than this avalanche of unpurchaseable publicity? The pictures are soul-stirring, amazing, hair-raising,—actually blood curdling in spots. They will fairly knock the audience off their seats, as one enthusiastic Showman said. The Williamson Submarine Moving Pictures will hold your audiences spellbound, the pictures are in "THE LILY OF POVERTY FLAT"

Bret Harte and the California Motion Picture Corporation

An unbeatable combination

BEATRIZ MICHELENA

Adapted from Bret Harte's poem, "Her Letter" and its two sequels, "His Reply" and "Her Last Letter," "THE LILY OF POVERTY FLAT" mirrors with historical fidelity that epoch which California's inimitable author has immortalized in story and poem.

This film drama pulsates with the spirit of the pioneer West,—not an imaginary nor an exaggerated West, but the real West which the gold seeker found, fought for and won.

It is the story of stirring events and big motives, whereby order was moulded out of chaos and an empire out of lawless abandon, but, running through, giving purpose to, and eventually overtopping all, is the one supreme motive—a woman's love for a man, against which difference in wealth, intrigue and every adversity are unable to prevail.

In "THE LILY OF POVERTY FLAT" Beatriz Michelena has a remarkably effective medium for the display of her acknowledged histrionic talents. She is the one actress who can place "The Lily" among the really greatest screen characterizations that this country has ever seen.

Produced through special arrangement with Houghton Mifflin Company.

The greater love discovered---"Greater Than Art."

The new life, the new way---"His Convert."

GERTRUDE McCOY, EDWARD EARLE AND DUNCAN McRAE

IN

A Feature of Force

The 3-Act "GREATER THAN ART"

Lee Arthur, the father of many big stage successes and now writing exclusively for Edison, gives us here the play of a big dramatist. No emotion that the human heart is capable of is left untouched in this master plot of a girl, delicately nurtured, by financial stress being forced to make the great sacrifice to further her art genius only to find too late that "greater than art" is a pure man's love. And Gertrude McCoy picturizes power in her delineation of the terrible emotional struggle such a woman passes through. Duncan McRae is the embodiment of satanic finesse while Edward Earle portrays manfully the part that Fate wrecks him with. Released, in the regular service, Monday, April 26th—3000 feet.

The Two Artistic Favorites, Marc MacDermott and Mabel Trunnelle, in a Play of Passion, Greed and Regeneration "HIS CONVERT."

Few players indeed could handle as skillfully as do this pair, Marc MacDermott and Mabel Trunnelle, this delicate theme of a woman of the underworld, pictured in the realism of its tragic life, meeting a club man parading as a preacher. Released Saturday, May 1st—1000 feet.

Waddy and Arty in the Laugh-tickler, "The Idle Rich"

Wadsworth and Housman, as the hoboes whom unfortunate Fate has allowed to find a thousand dollar bill—which they can't get changed—provide a merry reel of funny adventure as full of laughs as the bill is of dollars. Released Tuesday, April 27th—1000 feet.

All Edison Films are passed upon by the National Board of Censorship and released through the General Film Co.'s Program

Scene from the 2-Act Drama, "Poisoned by Jealousy"

Scene from the Comedy, "Count Macaroni"

Bessie Learn, Carlton King and Harry Beaumont

IN THE

2-Act Drama of Diabolic Cunning

"POISONED BY JEALOUSY"

These three favorites are most happily cast—Bessie Learn as the pathetic little madonna of sunny Italy, the centre of the storm of jealousy, appeals with true heart appeal. Carlton King, a capital villain always, who plays the role of the treacherous friend to whom the little wife is entrusted, adds another "good" villain to his record, while Harry Beaumont as the conspired-against, forlorn little Italian battling his way up in a strange country wins our admiration and sympathy. Released Friday, April 30th—2000 feet.

The Distinguished English Comedian, Dallas Welford, and Likable, Clever Raymond McKee, in the Comedy, "Count Macaroni."

Dallas Welford will be easily remembered as the comedian who toured all England and America as something greater than a "Broadway Star" in comedies that played for several years. Raymond McKee, new to Edison films, is already a top-notcher when it comes to getting the real spontaneous laughs of genuine comedy. McKee, love-lorn and a loser in the love race, out of revenge, creates a street sweep (Welford) into "Count Macaroni." Welford has a face that the Lord made to laugh at—it's a scream "screen face." And then there's James Harris, too, to make some more fun. Released Wednesday, April 28th—1000 feet.

FEATURES IN SPECIAL SERVICE.

Walter E. Perkins, the original laugh-getter, repeats his prolonged Broadway success in the Edison version of "My Friend from India," in three parts. Hanlon Brothers' "Fantasma," a feature of fun, fantastic adventure, illusion and mystery, charms in the film more than it did on the stage where it enjoyed the never-equalled run of over a quarter of a century. Hanlon in the famous clown role. In five parts. Both now ready and secured through the General Film Company.

Comedies, Featuring

"HAM" and "BUD"

Said the Moving Picture World recently:—

"The selection of the right sort of a comedy is a hard and delicate task. The trouble is in the lack of a happy medium between vulgar comedies and tiresome comedies."

It is our firm opinion that this problem no longer exists—that the "happy medium" was found when the first "HAM" Comedy was produced. For proof of this assertion, we urge exhibitors to secure the latest of the "HAM" Comedies. Although Ham and Bud, as amateur cracksmen, are screamingly funny, there's never a vulgar or a tiresome moment from first scene to last. "Lotta Coin's Ghost" will be

LOTTA COIN'S GHOST

Facts and Comments

VISIONS and apparitions constitute one of the peculiar advantages of the screen over the stage. Good judgment and a becoming sense of the artistic are needful, however, to make these advantages count. Too many of the screen apparitions look to be in rugged health and possessed of a good appetite. It is disillusioning to see a wraith fresh from the realm of shades look substantial enough to partake of solid food. The vision and the apparition should, of course, be dim and shadowy. That is the way the human imagination has generally pictured visitors from the "unknown land." Double exposure is a most delicate instrument that may be used only with the utmost delicacy and discretion; in incompetent or inexperienced hands it often turns a tense moment into a scene of farce, provoking ribald laughter.

NOTHING more clearly illustrates the change that has come over the motion picture theater than the permanent place which the educational picture has now secured on most of the programs in the big houses. Two or three years ago the average exhibitor viewed anything "educational" with suspicion and alarm. To-day the educational picture is not the least important part of the program and is no longer merely tolerated as a "filler." We consider this fact as one of the best arguments in favor of the proposition that the motion picture theater needs no legislative assistance in the selection of its program. Censorship is especially absurd when it attempts to impose itself on films of an educational character.

THE more intimately one comes in contact with the enemies of the picture the more obvious becomes their lack of knowledge on the subject. At public meetings in favor of Sunday opening and before legislative committees and even upon the floor of the legislature, the opponents of the motion picture betray a remarkable ignorance in regard to the subject they attempt to discuss. One of the myths we constantly encounter is the tale of a "vast fund" raised by the film men to "desecrate the Sabbath," and to "kill censorship." We are told that there is a terrible film trust which drives the exhibitors with a whip of steel, and which spends thousands of dollars to corrupt the honest politicians at Albany, Harrisburg, Columbus, etc., etc. Canon Chase has done his share to keep this fiction alive and give it the widest publicity. All attempts to enlighten him have recoiled from his steadfast determination to remain in blissful ignorance. We are willing to credit some of the enemies of the motion picture with good faith, but it is characteristic of them that they are eager to suspect the motives of every who does not agree with their views of things.

MOST of the legislatures now in session are close to adjournment and we may indulge a brief review of their work as far as it affects the motion picture interests. Never before in the history of the motion picture has it received more attention at the hands of the law givers than within the past four months. If all the bills aimed at the regulation of the motion picture had been enacted into laws the picture, in spite of all its vitality, would not have been able to survive. Happily only a very small percentage of the bills were placed on the statute books. Everywhere the exhibitors realized the dangers of this indiscriminate and ill-advised mass of proposed legislation and opposed it successfully. Let us all appreciate the fact that this work of defending the motion picture against its enemies in the halls of legislation has only just begun. Next year we must be ready once more. Organization is imperative.

WE RECEIVE many letters protesting against drinking scenes, scenes of men smoking cigarettes, the interior of "cheap drinking saloons," etc. The screen aims to portray life as it finds life. Whatever we may think personally about the folly of drinking and about the unwholesome atmosphere of the saloon, these evils cannot be eliminated or even diminished by banishing them from the screen entirely and without qualification. To show such scenes surely does not mean that the producer personally approves saloons and wants the public to patronize them. Very often these scenes are shown with a good purpose and as deterrent examples. We have seen pictures of reeling drunkards in many a publication devoted to the cause of total abstinence,

Exhibitors Unite

By W. Stephen Bush.

The Moving Picture World on another page of this issue prints a list of the officers of the National League and a list of the officers in the various state branches of the league. We hope in this way to help in maintaining general interest in the league. It is important to have the exhibitors throughout the country know just where they have to turn whenever they decide to join the league.

At best these lists are nothing more than guide posts indicating the right direction. It is to the advantage of every single exhibitor in the United States to get in touch with his league officials and to join the organization. The revival of interest in the league, which followed Mr. Pearce's accession to the Presidency, has borne fruit. The fight against hostile legislation in fourteen states could never have been carried on successfully without the exhibitors. Indeed the exhibitors with negligible exceptions did all the fighting themselves. We have not the space to recount all the proposed hostile legislation, but a few of the measures that were killed may be mentioned. In Kansas, for instance, a tax of three hundred dollars for each motion picture theater had been proposed in the legislature. No good reason, in fact, not even an ostensible reason, had been given for this confiscatory bill. Of course, a measure of this kind would have put most of the Kansas exhibitors out of business. In Tennessee two vicious censor bills had been introduced; one was killed early in the session, the other is still "threatening," but at last accounts its prospects of becoming a law were not over brilliant. In New York a young Assemblyman who said that the motion picture theatre was a better school for crime than the Elmira Reformatory, introduced a preposterous and ill-considered measure for "censoring" the motion picture. That measure may be considered dead. One of the most effective speakers against the bill was the president of the New York local organization of exhibitors. By the way, we may assure the young Assemblyman that he will hear from the exhibitors if he ever asks for the suffrages of the people. In Massachusetts no less than fifteen bills for "regulating" motion pictures were introduced, but the united action of the exhibitors killed them all before they were very far advanced on the legislative calendar.

It would be easy to fill pages with reports of "local" measures against motion picture theaters. There is scarcely a city of any respectable size where "local" reformers have not harrassed the exhibitors and even in many country towns where they have but one or two motion picture housese there have been attempts at unwarranted interference with exhibitors.

All of this spells the necessity of organization. While some progress has been made a vast room for improvement remains. There is no royal road to success in organization. To create an organization, to add to it, to keep it going means constant work. As one who knows whereof he speaks I may be permitted to say that after all only a very small percentage of the exhibitors is organized. The worst enemy of organization is indifference. There are hundreds and probably thousands of exhibitors who dismiss the subject of organization with a shrug of indifference. They refuse to become interested. The only way to meet this evil is by a campaign of education and personal appeal. Persistence, and nothing but persistence, will win the day. Of course there is no sound argument against joining the league, and there are a hundred arguments in favor of joining it. We do not think there are any exhibitors who do not admit in theory, at least, that organization is a good thing. Unfortunately, too many of them never go any further. Our organization in New York has been a pretty fair sample in this respect. Only in the face of immediate and pressing danger has it been possible to get them together and to make them act in harmony. A good deal might have been accomplished by timely prevention in the days of peace, but the indifference of the majority made a strong concerted action impossible.

Here and elsewhere the hard work has always fallen upon the shoulders of a few public-spirited exhibitors who devoted themselves to the common welfare without reward and without expectation of reward. These men were never appreciated as they should have been. It is a deplorable fact that the man who unselfishly labors for the benefit of all does not, as a rule, get even the recognition which we give to a hired man. The men who in any state hold office under the charter of the league are entitled to the co-operation of all exhibitors. These officers cannot do their best unless they are properly supported. Many of them serve entirely without compensation, others receive but a nominal stipend for their labors. The least they can ask for is an intelligent and sympathetic support from the men in whose behalf they are working.

It is evident even to the most casual observer that the National League has a vast field of usefulness before it. The Moving Picture World has on various occasions pointed out that powerful and genuinely representative state organizations are the backbone of the National League. The National League can accomplish very little unless it consists of strong, loyal and active state units. If such units exist the National League will soon be in a position to render invaluable services to the exhibitors who belong to it. With headquarters in one of the great centers of the country, with a staff of trained experts, the National League will be in a position to extend good advice and render genuine service to all exhibitors. A Bureau of Information and Advice would be in a position to aid the exhibitor in practically all the problems he has to encounter in his profession. We know what these problems are: Problems of construction, of lighting, of management, questions of law and legislation, problems of film service, and numerous other questions that are confronting the exhibitor every day. All these problems are practical and generally demand immediate action. The Bureau of Information which might be maintained by the National League would soon become a clearing house of ideas and an invaluable store house of information. The per capita tax which the National League asks of its members would be the wisest investment an exhibitor could possibly make.

Preparations are now under way for a great representative National Convention of Exhibitors to be held in San Francisco in the month of July. This convention will surely be the most important event in the history of the organized exhibitors. If it is well attended, if the new spirit of service and comradeship will guide its councils, we may expect a strong, useful league, which will firmly unite the exhibiting interests all over the country and be a credit to the entire industry and a sure guaranty of its future prosperity. Exhibitors, more true to-day than ever IN UNION THERE IS STRENGTH.

Unappreciated Roscius

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

IS IT not monstrous that this player here, but in a fiction, in a dream of passion, could force his soul so to his own conceit that from her working all his visage wann'd; tears in his eyes, distraction in's aspect, a broken voice, and his whole function suiting with forms to his conceit? and all for nothing! For Hecuba! What's Hecuba to him, or he to Hecuba, that he should weep for her?"

Human creature of multiple personality, the actor who can "show virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and pressure," can disassociate himself from his own individuality and take on a new one that is apparently out of his range. Our inheritance is composite, and, if we partake of the characters of remote ancestors, each one of us is a group of personalities impelled by the stronger ones or favoring ideas which most appeal to the majority of those associated in one soul. Science has proven beyond doubt that slight accidents may change all that we know of a person to a new formation wholly different from that to which we have been accustomed, and it occurs without accident. "How different he is from what he used to be!" "How changed she is!" are common remarks based on recognition that complete metamorphosis is possible in human character.

The actor in real life is usually kind-hearted, generous and capable of entertaining social acquaintances, particularly of his own profession, as long as he is permitted to be in the limelight. To be the centre of attention is the very breath of his life. He will talk well on his experiences and interestingly until he gets to the "twenty-years' ago" period, but he usually lacks the wondrous grace and charm of being an appreciative listener. Not always, but often, he is silent because he is preparing to spring his latest press clipping on you.

In spite of his many little faults in his proper person however, Roscius has accomplished more than the director and far more than the average author to make the characters of a photo-drama worth knowing intimately. An audience is in some respects comparable to organized society. In actual life, we reserve the right to select our acquaintances. We consider that we are capable of distinguishing between people who are worth knowing and those who are not, and we shield ourselves with disbelief in the individuals we meet until we try them out, or until they manifest certain attributes which are to our liking. It is a good deal so with an audience watching performers in the visualization of a story. People in front are not active—they are not going out of their way to meet people of the screen. They are receptive. It is a case of "Show me," before I take any interest in your career. If Roscius fails, there is no characterization.

When a story is related in print, the writer may employ elementary means to tell the reader what a noble man the hero is. On the stage, the butler and the maid discuss the hero in glowing terms before he steps forth to the enraptured gaze of the matinee maiden eating chocolate drops in the balcony. On the screen, Roscius must reveal himself as someone else without a written or spoken word and to people who have acquired a microscopic insight into motives. What shall he do? Shall he tear passion to tatters a la Clara Morris, or shall he preserve an attitude as refined and wholly innocuous as the Atlantic Monthly?

Denied the indirect delineation through manner of speech, Roscius must find a convincing way of portraying character through action. There is a quarrel over a game of cards. Whether he shall be violent and impulsive or coldly bitter and malignant, therein lies all that is to be suggested to the audience. How he looks and acts under such circumstances may definitely settle what people in front are to know about his natural tendencies, and every movement becomes contributory to the effect produced. More delicate means of indirect delineation is that of exhibiting the effect one character has upon another, especially in a conflict of human will. One such force being opposed to another brings out the native peculiarities of an individual.

Except in some forms of comedy, the methods of Charles Dickens, that of dwelling on a dominant trait, will scarcely be effective on the screen. Roscius is compelled to portray, not one human peculiarity, but the complex make-up that is easily recognized as being our own. He may be compelled, at the same time, to disassociate his own personality from that of his role and to exhibit through some form of bodily expression emotions he does not feel. This splitting up of his multiple personality and consequent revelation of one of its phases is an art known only to Roscius. He has a secret all his own. Authorship, directorship, may be acquired—an actor is born an actor.

Is he a French peasant, sentenced to the galleys for the theft of a loaf of bread, only to attain through humiliation and suffering a broader view of his kind and deeper insight into the heart of humanity, then to go forth and disseminate the glory of a great soul? Is he a noble young Roman of Pagan ideals enforced by environment, yet heroic enough from natal grandeur of character to enter upon and desperately maintain a revolt against the cruelty, the injustice, the demoralizing debauchery of Caesarean courts? Is he a Soldier of Fortune, a roystering swordsman of the Cardinal's Guards, the gaming table his mainstay, the dungeon his impending fate, yet sent on a perilous mission to protect a persecuted lady, only to win her love by his innate nobility and his loyal devotion in moments of peril? Is he a clergyman of scholarly attainment and life so upright that he is the idol of his flock, yet pursued by haunting memories of a great sin that comes home to him in the end and damns him forever in public opinion yet bring him closer to God as expressed in erring human nature? Is he a man of clouded title to a place in society, one who has been loudly heralded as belonging to the unfit, yet engaged in the bitter upward struggle of self-regeneration for the sake of loved ones and for the sake of proving the finer side of his nature? Roscius must be all of these and more besides. He must draw from his multiple personality an infinity of characterization.

From Roscius has come the larger part of whatever manifestation of mind and heart there has been shown in pictured stories. The principal motives behind action are rarely enough revealed on the screen, and then still more rarely through the agency of either author or director. It has been left to Roscius to present human motive in recognizable moods, and he has done so much in an admirable way to provide this fascinating element in photodramas that I have been very gentle in what I have had to say about him. That he has often appeared to disadvantage in screen pictures is due to lack of opportunity far more than to lack of capacity.

Chance to Kill Censorship

THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD will submit to the Constitutional Convention in this state an addition to the organic law granting to the motion picture the same freedom of expression which is now enjoyed by the press. We propose to make a strong fight for having such an amendment submitted to the vote of the people in November and we earnestly hope that the proposition will have the united support of the industry.

The amendment will be to Article I, Section 8, of the present constitution, entitled "Freedom of Speech and of the Press."

"Every person may freely speak, write and publish his sentiments on all subjects being responsible for the abuse of that right and no law shall be passed to restrain or abridge the liberty of speech or of the press. Kinematographic records, whether of dramatic or educational subjects, shall enjoy the same privileges and immunities which under this section are accorded to the press, and no law shall be passed imposing any previous legal restraint upon such records."

The language of our amendment, which is printed in italics, is purely tentative and, of course, subject to change.

If the propaganda for this amendment is successful on the floor of the convention, and if it is then ratified by the people, it will not only mean the end of all censorship in this state, but it will serve as a most valuable precedent for action in other states.

V. L. S. E. Managers

New Combination Announces Managers in Five Cities—Walter W. Irvin Is General Manager.

ANNOUNCEMENT was made last week by President A. E. Smith, of the "V. L. S. E." Company, to the effect that branches would be opened at once in five cities. The general manager has also been named, together with the men who are to have charge of the branches opened. The main office of the company at 1600 Broadway, New York, has been completely fitted up and furnished for the needs of the business and the work of distributing pictures was to have been commenced on Monday, April 19.

For general manager of the new feature company Walter W. Irvin has been selected. Mr. Irvin is a lawyer by profession, but his affiliation with the Vitagraph Company, extending over several years, has made him familiar with the motion picture business.

The New York exchange will be in charge of J. W. Partridge. In Chicago I. Van Ronkle, one of the old-timers and most successful exchange managers, will be in charge. At Toronto, Can., W. C. Brandon will take charge. Mr. Meade, well known to exhibitors in the Southwest, has been chosen for the office at Dallas, Texas, and J. S. Hebrew will have charge of the office in Philadelphia.

All the branch managers selected have been in the employ of the General Film Company in similar capacities and are well equipped to conduct an exchange.

TOOMEY & DEMARA'S NEW THEATER.

The Toomey & Demara Amusement Enterprises, with offices in the Colonial Theater, Lawrence, Mass., will erect upon the site of their Nickel Theater a 1,675-seating capacity house in Lawrence, which is now in the course of being demolished, a 3,000-seat picture house. The new project will take about $200,000 to complete. It will be 60 feet in height, and the facade, lobby and interior will be attractively decorated.

Escalators at the lobby near the Essex street side will be used to carry patrons to the mezzanine and balcony floors. Many other improvements will be installed in the new theater, which will be named the City. The Toomey & Delmara Enterprises operate several other moving picture and vaudeville houses, but it is expected that the new structure will eclipse all the others.

Gaston Melies Dead

Pioneer Motion Picture Man Passes at Corsica—Was an Important Factor in the Trade.

A DELAYED cable from Ajaccio, Corsica, announces the death of Gaston Melies, a pioneer of the film business. Death was caused by typhoid fever. Mr. Melies' was one of the most interesting careers in the film industry. He was the first to establish the film business in America, coming from France in 1903, handling the Star Films, produced by his brother, George Melies, in Paris. Old time exhibitors will remember some of these Star trick films as the finest films they ever ran, such as "Cinderella" and "A Trip to the Moon."

The growth of the industry, however, and the introduction of American drama curtailed the demand for trick pictures and dramatic productions were necessary to the continuance of the business.

Mr. Melies commenced his American productions in 1909 and early in 1910 organized the Melies Manufacturing Company. He was a licensee of the Motion Picture Patents Company and upon the formation of the General Film Company was a director and shareholder in that company.

In August, 1910, he resigned as director of the General Film Company and assumed active charge of his productions, first in Texas, then in Santa Paula, California. Western subjects comprised his principal productions at this time.

In 1912, with his complete stock company, he made a Pacific tour including the Society Islands, Australia, Java and Japan. The hardships of this tour proved too much for his health and he returned to this country in the summer of 1913, a wreck of his former self. Later in that year he retired from the business and spent his last days in France and Corsica.

Paul G. Melies, his son, is now in active charge of the Melies Manufacturing Company.

Cartoonists Go to Court

John R. Bray Brings Suit Against Harry Palmer for Alleged Infringement of Patent on Animated Drawings.

JOHN R. BRAY, a pioneer in the making of animated cartoons, has brought suit in the United States District Court against Harry Palmer, claiming an infringement of patents granted by the United States Patent office on August 11, 1914. In Mr. Bray's suit, filed April 6, he asks for an injunction restraining the defendant from further infringments of the patent, and also for an accounting of damages already sustained. The court allowed Mr. Palmer twenty days in which to file an answer to the suit.

The decision rendered in this case probably will be of permanent importance to cartoonists who have entered the moving picture field, for if Mr. Bray's claims are sustained it is likely that he will institute similar proceedings against other men subject to the charges held valid in the case of Mr. Palmer, whose cartoons are being released on the Kriterion program. For several years Mr. Bray's humorous drawings have been a prominent feature of the Pathe releases.

According to the complainant's attorney, C. W. Fairbank, the case is based on a patent applied for, January 9, 1914, and granted the following August to cover a "process of and articles for producing moving pictures." It is asserted that Mr. Bray spent years in experimentation before he discovered a feasible method of presenting animated cartoons on the screen, and that other men are now stepping in to profit by his labors. An important clause in the patent refers to the tracing paper used in making the drawings. It reads: "By the term translucent, I mean to include any and all sheet material which under the actual conditions of use will permit lines, marks, or representations of objects on one sheet to be seen through the superimposed sheet sufficiently clearly for the purpose set forth."

Attorney Fairbank declares that his client has no wish to drive other cartoonists out of the moving picture business; but that he believes royalties should be paid for the use of a system which he invented.

FISH OPENS THE GEM.

H. Bradley Fish, until recently proprietor of the Eleventh Avenue Theater, Denver, Colo., has opened the Gem Theater in Idaho Springs, Colo. The opening took place on March 31, and although but a short time has passed since that event, Mr. Fish is well pleased with the results. Idaho Springs is a beautiful mountain town and summer resort, and Mr. Fish expects that his receipts will be particularly gratifying during the warm period, due to the influx of vacationists.

"The Diamond From the Sky."

An Inside Story of Its Filming by Terrence Eugene Tedmarsh, Secretary of the Judges Who Awarded the $10,000 Prize.

I HAVE just spent two absorbing, intense hours with S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Company. Hutchinson has solved one of the most difficult problems ever presented to a producer of the film drama. "The Diamond from the Sky," from the very nature which makes it so powerful a story, presented perplexing technical problems, problems of cast, problems of action, problems of photography.

The author of this romance over-rode every convention in writing his heart compelling story. He mastered his own problems of technique and left a hundred of others for the master producer of the picture to solve. It is probably because of the very nature of these difficulties that Hutchinson has been inspired to the attainment of his striking success in the pictorialization of this story.

S. S. Hutchinson.

Some weeks ago Hutchinson came to Chicago and waited to get the winning manuscript. Then for three days and two nights he sped westward to Santa Barbara in uninterrupted study. The appealing story of "The Diamond from the Sky" was read and reread in those thousands of miles of plain and mountain. The master producer, spurred to thought by the impelling story, was concentrating on his task. It was Hutchinson's task to paint a thrilling, tense panorama of human life, to reconstruct history that never happened except in the imagination of the writer of "The Diamond from the Sky." To this end he must choose of men and materials.

"Long before I stepped off the train into the sunshine of Santa Barbara I had decided on the man who should do the producing," Mr. Hutchinson related reviewing his labors. "In choosing this man and in the making of the choice of those who were to assist him I had much of the talent of the motion picture business to choose from. The man I chose was Jacques Jaccard, the director who is now putting 'The Diamond from the Sky' into the films. His experience has been of just such range as best fits him for his assignment. And great among his qualities is youth. Romance is illuminated only with the fire of youth. I early resolved that the energy and inspiration of youth must shine through this production in every line.

"In selecting a camera man my thought fell almost automatically on George Hill, George 'Tripod' Hill. I took pains to investigate particularly the quality of his work, and when I came to his work on "The Hypocrites' I knew he was the man.

"Then there came the matter of the technical director. There is only one Fred Priest, and that was the answer. The selection of exterior scenes and the construction of interiors is a particular and special part in the production. It has been a part of his work to take the old Virginia with all its cavalier atmosphere and set it down in California to give it a place in the sun. With this technical phase of the problem solved I came to the perhaps more difficult and intangible problems of the cast.

"In the selection of the actors I considered hundreds and talked to scores of them. Every possible candidate for a place in the cast was weighed and analyzed in the light of the exacting requirements of the story and the conception of the finished picture.

"In the first place, because of the nature of the plot, it became instantly necessary to enroll two sets of actors of star quality, and in the use of that word star let me remark that nobody was chosen because of a name, because of a reputation. It was not stars that I sought, it was the capability in each actor and actress. The action of the piece rapidly eliminates the actors who first appear, hence the double set of stars.

"Then for the highly important purpose of preventing the confusion of personalities in the story on the part of the moving picture patrons I had to seek the height of contrast in the types of actors. It would never do to permit the slightest possibility of the spectator mistaking the identity of a single character for a single scene. In the opening of the romance it is necessary to represent the hero and heroine as babies.

"That baby business certainly was a problem. As the novel relates both of the babies were born on the same day—these changeling children of fate. We had to have two babies, a boy and a girl, each four weeks old, a dark infant to represent Arthur Stanley, the gypsy child, a fair baby as Esther, true heiress of the title and the diamond from the sky."

"It is not often," Hutchinson continued, "that babies are so important to the trend of the plot. Usually babies are incidental. Here they are everything.

"Then as the action progresses the principals appear in their early youth. The role of Esther made it necessary to get a young girl. The lead calls for a girl with all that is lovely and desirable in a girl; I had to find an actress with that indescribable charm of youth, pretty, fresh, vivacious, innocent, ingenuous, magnetic. It was necessary not only that the actress have these qualities, but that she be able to get them 'across' from the screen to the audience effectively. It was necessary to find the girl whose charm and magnetism was infectious and communicable in the expressions of the silent drama. In this connection I interviewed about twenty-five prominent moving picture actresses. The choice was made when I talked with Lottie Pickford.

"In this choice the Pickford name, made famous through the successes of Lottie's sister Mary, had absolutely no weight. Lottie was chosen for herself alone. And she would have been chosen for the part if the name Pickford had never been heard in filmland before—because of all the actresses available she is so pre-eminently the one for the part.

"Then we come to the almost equally important part of Arthur Stanley. Here again the high quality of youth was required. I chose Irving Cummings because he is a young romantic actor.

"For the part of Blair Stanley, calling for a 'silk hat or gentleman heavy,' the possible actors were considered one by one until the elimination left the ideal man for the part, William Russell, otherwise known in the film world as 'Big Bill.' Also he furnished the required contract to Cummings in the role of Arthur Stanley.

"A vitally important choice had to be made in casting the role of the adventuress who appears as the accomplice in the genteel villainy of Blair Stanley. Here again I was fortunate in being able to use Charlotte Burton, a most accomplished actress for the purpose. I made a ten strike in the selection of George Periolat for the part of the 'mean heavy' who appears in the deeds of daring and violence inspired by the circumspectly careful villain, Blair Stanley. Periolat has the reputation of being one of the best make-up artists in the country. Then there is William Tedmarsh as a lucky human fact in the cast. He appears in the part of Quabba, the hunchback gypsy. He is convincing and compelling of attention on the screen.

Director Jaccard Directing Opening Scene of "The Diamond from the Sky."

"In the plant at Santa Barbara where the play is being filmed nature herself is making a great contribution to this great romance. The lay of the land conduces to a remarkably clarity of atmosphere, a striking crispness and clearness of light. An unlimited range of photographic and scenic possibilities is presented by our location. Natural settings that range from the tropical to the temperate zone in flora are available in easy distance."

Hutchinson paused in one of those moments of reflection when his busy mental processes speed on ahead of his deliberate careful speech.

"I was thinking," he mused, "of the great and probably much under estimated value of environment in the production of moving pictures. We have done everything that can be done to give the players in this romance film the advantages of environment. It is one of the measures taken to guarantee perfection that we have given them inspirational surroundings. For the time in which this picture is being taken they are as people transformed—they are from day to day actually living the story of "The Diamond from the Sky." They are surrounded by the beauty, charm and romance that they are transmitting to the film. Not even the most minute details has been neglected. Even the fittings in the dressing rooms have been considered to prevent the introduction of a jarring note.

"The proper sort of environment makes for excellence of acting just as a becoming gown makes a girl step with pride.

"The romance must be vibrant with sympathy, suspense and immediate gripping interest. We have gone to limits before unknown in the making of films to secure this. And the world will know how well we have succeeded when the first release is made May 3."

There you have it, Hutchinson, the master producer, and his masterpiece.

THE AMERICAN FILM LABORATORIES, INC., OPEN NEW PLANT.

The American Film Laboratories, Inc., located at 69-71 West 90th Street, New York City, recently opened their plant for commercial operation. This being located in the heart of New York City and working under fire license, insures quick deliveries and a safe place for the manufacturer's negatives. The plant is fireproof and has every known modern device for producing the finest quality of work. All of the machinery used is of the highest class known to the trade. All air is thoroughly filtered, heated in winter, cooled in summer and the humidity extracted so that there is a uniformity throughout the atmosphere in which the film is worked. The company is not connected with any producing company, but does wholly and solely a commercial business with the trade in general, so that all work turned out receives the same careful attention.

That such a plant as this was needed is proved by the orders the company is receiving from various parts of the country for the development of negatives and printing of positives therefrom. The plant's capacity is over a million feet a week, and as it occupies an entire building is not cramped for room.

The company's chief aim is to turn out quality work. Louis B. Jennings is president and general manager, and Edwin S. Porter, technical director of the Famous Players Film Company, is vice-president.

Sidney Olcott Engaged by Famous Players!

Abandons "Sidfilms" to Produce Important Subjects for the Big Feature Company.

THE Famous Players Film Company last week made an important addition to its producing staff by the engagement of Sidney Olcott, one of the most prominent and capable feature directors. Not alone is Mr. Olcott one of the oldest directors associated with the screen, having produced motion pictures constantly for the past eight years, but he also possesses a degree of versatility and a store of varied experience rare indeed to directors of either the spoken or silent drama.

Sidney Olcott.

The noted director, as is commonly known, was responsible for the production of those two celebrated screen successes, "From the Manger to the Cross" and "Colleen Bawn." Most recently Mr. Olcott has been producing independently under the name of "Sidfilms," which activity he abandoned upon receiving the offer of the Famous Players Film Company to become a member of its producing staff.

During his career and in the course of his duties as a screen director, Mr. Olcott has traversed nearly the entire globe, travelling thirty-five thousand miles in one season. It is probable that because of this familiarity with foreign customers and conditions, Mr. Olcott will be selected to direct several of the important series of subjects which the Famous Players intend to produce abroad during the coming summer. From his wide travels through ancient and historic cities, Mr. Olcott is as much at home amid the ruins of Luxor or Karnak; taking coffee with the sons of the Lybian Desert, gathered cross-legged about the hut of the village Sheik; elbowing his way through the noisy crowds of turbaned and veiled natives in the crowded bazaars of Cairo, as in a studio in New York, or on tungsten-lighted Broadway.

It is certain that Sidney Olcott and the Famous Players Film Company have both made a propitious connection.

ERNEST SHIPMAN RESIGNS FROM UNIVERSAL.

In order to carry out plans of a personal nature which have been maturing for some time, Ernest Shipman has tendered his resignation to the Universal Film Manufacturing Company to take effect on April 17th.

Mr. Shipman leaves immediately for a trip to the Pacific Coast, stopping at Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, Seattle, Denver and Chicago. On his return to New York he will begin immediate activities for the production of "The Mermaid," a seven reel photo drama by Captain Leslie T. Peacocke, author of "Neptune's Daughter." This picture will be made in the Bermudas.

He will also contract for the Princess Hassan in a seven-reel feature entitled "The Leopard Lady," which reveals her further adventures in the Orient. Other plans are also under way.

NEW DISTRIBUTING CONCERN.

L. Rosengarten, formerly president of the Cosmos Feature Film Corporation, Max H. Blackwell of the Favorite Players Film Company, and J. Charles Groshut, formerly director of sales for the Ambrosio American Company, have organized the Herald Film Corporation, which will operate in the United States and Canada as well as in foreign fields, buying, selling and distributing feature films of a high grade character made by well-known manufacturers and in which well-known stars will be the headliners. The executive offices are located on the 11th floor of 126 West 46th street. Work has already been started to operate on an extensive scale.

"The Sign of the Rose" Presented

Big Audience at Clune's Theater, Los Angeles, Enthusiastic Over First Exhibition of Beban's Picture Play.

Special to the Moving Picture World.

Los Angeles, Cal., April 12.

WHAT may prove to be the most important development of the motion picture saw its beginning tonight when Kessel & Baumann presented George Beban in "The Sign of the Rose," a combination of the silent and the spoken drama, at Clune's Auditorium. In the combination three factors stood out: There was a splendidly conceived and executed motion picture, running eighty-six hundred feet; there was a half hour of the spoken drama in which those who had been seen on the screen appeared in the flesh, and there was a remarkable musical program, the selections of which numbered nearly a hundred and ranged from popular songs of this and other days to the selections from well-known operas.

Three thousand persons laughed; some wept much, and all applauded generously during the silent and oral telling by Mr. Beban and his capable associates of the wonderfully appealing story. There was a demonstration at the close. Adam Kessel, president of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, who had delayed his return to the east partly on account of his desire to keep in touch with the preparations for the initial performance, was present. Thomas H. Ince, the producer, received congratulations; so, too, did Lloyd Brown, the Auditorium manager, for his presentation.

Several prominent actors closely watched the effect on the audience of the merging of the silent into the spoken drama.

"The Sign of the Rose" made an unusual hit, both as a picture and as a dramatic performance. Only the smaller cities will see it as a straight picture, Mr. Beban appearing personally in the larger centers. BLAISDELL.

CABIRIA IN CUBA.

Harry N. Raver, accompanied by his wife, sailed for Cuba on Wednesday, April 14, to superintend the first exhibition of "Cabiria" in the Grand National Opera House at Havana, the finest theater in Cuba. Last season's Knickerbocker theater presentation will be duplicated in Havana, including an orchestra of fifty men and a chorus of forty voices. The elaborate stage decoration by the Ackerman Studios and all the accessories used by Mr. Raver in New York have been shipped to Cuba for use there.

Mr. Raver has sold the Cuban rights to "Cabiria" to Senor Raphael O. Galvan, who is highly connected socially and politically, but whose motion picture experience has been limited. Speaking to a World representative just before sailing, Mr. Raver declared that this trip to Cuba was the first vacation he had in fifteen years. He expects a very busy summer as the Itala Company will at an early date release a wonderful production which Mr. Raver expects to take rank with "Cabiria." The head of the American Itala Company will remain in Havana until the engagement is well under way and will then return to New York.

The Strand Amusement Company, of Tampa, Fla., broke ground on April 14 for a new moving picture theater, which is estimated to cost $100,000. The project is backed by New York, Chicago and Tampa capitalists, and is the result of a trip through the South by M. A. Miller, of New York City, who was impressed with Tampa's need of a high-class photoplay theater. The new building will be erected at Tampa and Twiggs Streets, and will be a combination of Spanish and Moorish designs. Ponfoey & Elliot are the architects. They will be assisted by New York experts, in planning the projection and the acoustic arrangements of the building. An air-cooling plant will be one of the main features of the house, which is to be called the Strand Theater, and equipped with a fine pipe organ. It will have a seating capacity of 1,000 persons, and the opening is announced for the first of next October.

Feature and first run pictures will constitute the program of the new house, and an organ recital and musicale by local and visiting artists will be given every Friday.

The officers of the Strand Amusement Company are: C. D. Cooley, president; M. A. Miller, of New York, vice-president; P. Noland, of Tampa, secretary, and Jerome Waterman, of Tampa, treasurer. A. H. LaBelle will manage the theater. It is the intention of the company to build a chain of Strand theaters throughout the South.

New Assistant to Selznick

Harry C. Drum Brought from San Francisco to New York—A Rapid Rise.

THE only things that count with me are ability and loyalty," said Lewis J. Selznick, vice-president and general manager of the World Film Corporation, at the company's anniversary dinner on February 15, and "L. J." is as good as his word.

Harry Drum has been appointed assistant to the general manager of the World Film—a fine job, of which he may be envied. His ability has won him his promotion. Breaking into the film business in Chicago, shortly before Selznick founded the World Film, Drum was sent to take entire charge of the company's San Francisco office.

Harry C. Drum.

There he did so well for World Film, the office began to do such large business, it became such an important factor in World Film progress, that Mr. Drum stepped up to the position of western division manager, working the territory as far east as Denver.

"Mr. Drum," declares Mr. Selznick, "was one of the first to grasp my ideas with regard to talking film service and early contracts to exhibitors. He can help them increase business, instead of merely talking to them about it. He has done so wonderfully well out west that I have brought him east and appointed him my assistant here, so that he may grow even bigger here than he was in San Francisco. He will have every chance to do so. World Film is big enough for the biggest men. My policy is to give everybody in the organization the chance to rise to the biggest positions in World Film."

Harry Drum is a popular and progressive young film man, sure to be liked and to succeed in the east. His brother, W. W. Drum, who was World Film's Los Angeles manager, has been appointed to succeed Harry at San Francisco, and H. F. McConville steps into the vacancy created at Los Angeles, where he acted as assistant to "W. W."

DAVIDSON COMING.

Thomas H. Davidson, of Davidson's Film Sales Agency, London, Eng., drops the Moving Picture World a line to say that he is about due for a visit to New York. He should be here about now.

LASKY SIGNS INA CLAIRE.

So satisfactory has been the work of Ina Claire in the Lasky production, "Wild Goose Chase," that the company has engaged her for another production to begin at once, and have secured her signature to a contract binding her services for the period of five years.

LAURA HOPE CREWS WITH LASKY.

It is announcd by the Lasky Feature Play Company that the Lasky-Belasco release following "The Woman" will be "The Fighting Hope," in which Laura Hope Crews will be featured. Miss Crews is one of the best known of the younger Broadway stars.

SCENARIO WRITER DROPS DEAD.

Edwin Bliss, well known as a contributor to magazines and of late a scenario writer, dropped dead in a hallway of the Hotel Vanderbilt, New York, early on the morning of April 14th. Death was due to heart disease. Mr. Bliss had just completed writing the scenarios for the "Who Pays" series being produced by Pathe. He was 36 years old and apparently in the best of health when he dined with a party of friends at the Vanderbilt the evening before his death.

Another Quality Triumph.

Paramount Solidifies its Relations with Famous Players and Lasky Through a Contract for a Quarter of a Century—The Arrangement Is the Result of Many Earnest Conferences—Interviews with the Parties to the Unprecedented Contract.

CONTRACTS have been completed between the Famous Players, the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company on the one hand and the Paramount Pictures Corporations on the other hand, insuring a continuance of the present relations between these companies for a period of twenty-five years. This is the longest period of time ever covered by a contract between producer and exhibitor. It is hoped by the parties to the contract that it will act as a firm basis for profitable future relations. All rejoice at the vast opportunities for film progress which the new contract is certain to afford. The chief aim of all the parties to the contract has been the improvement of quality with its resultant benefits to the exhibitor. In the last analysis these contracts are contingent in their nature, i. e., contingent upon the quality turned out by the producers. Every incentive is given to the producer to make the very best pictures it is possible to produce.

By this latest affiliation of interests the extraordinary subjects handled by the Select Film Booking Agency will be distributed in such a manner as to protect the interests of the Paramount exhibitors.

The contracts which have just been closed are the result of many important and earnest conferences between all the parties in interest and it is needless to say have the fullest approval and support of all concerned.

A World representative saw Adolph Zukor, the president of the Famous Players. He expressed his views of the new arrangement in these words:

"The financial and artistic success of the Paramount Program is now undisputed by the firmest former believers that the feature could not be distributed in the regular manner for an exclusive program; but, far from resting content with this achievement, we are all determined to surpass it in as great a degree in the future as we have in the past excelled all other distributing systems.

"With the greater affiliation of interest derived from the recent extension of contracts between the Paramount and the producers releasing through it covering the unprecedented period of twenty-five years we are offered an unequaled incentive of the most enduring kind for further progress. The permanency of this arrangement offers for the first time in the growth of the motion picture art a genuine possibility for a perpetual policy of merit and distinction."

Samuel Goldfish, speaking for the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Co., comments upon the new arrangement between the producers and the Paramount Pictures Corporation as follows:

"Probably the most important aspect of the new arrangement, not only from the viewpoint of the trade, but in the eyes of millions of photoplay patrons, is the great encouragement which it gives the producers to redouble their efforts for the still further advancement of an art which they have already developed most remarkably. Naturally, the cost of producing photodramas increases in proportion as we pay higher salaries for stars and associate players; as we consume more and more time in order to let no details escape attention; and as we make the settings continually more elaborate and realistic. It is not reasonable that we should forever multiply these risks unless we have at least moderate expectation of greater income to offset the augmented expenditures.

"Twenty-five years is the stipulated duration of our new understanding with the Paramount. This is the record long-term contract for the amusement business in America. By thus binding ourselves together we pledge ourselves to progress not only from day to day but from year to year, knowing we shall have time to reap what we sow."

William W. Hodkinson, President of the Paramount Pictures Corporation, was seen by a representative of The Moving Picture World in his private office in the World's Tower Building, and he was evidently gratified at the new arrangements, which he considers an unfailing guarantee for Paramount future. He said that the harmonious relations were practically put beyond all peril by the terms of the new contracts.

"The phenomenal development of the Paramount Program," he said, "due to the consistent merits of Famous Players, Lasky and Bosworth productions, and to the efficient co-operation which we have succeeded in establishing between the individual exchanges and the exhibitors, will be further advanced within the next few months.

"Quality and system have placed manufacturers and distributors of Paramount Pictures in the lead of the whole world, and there is no evidence that upon the first year of Paramount having elapsed, there will be any other concern so far advanced as Paramount was at its beginning on September 1, 1914."

To indicate definitely that these ideas were originated by the President of Paramount Pictures Corporation and were advocated by him in 1910, some years before any of the present feature producing companies were in existence, we use the following from The Film Index of March, 1910:

A longer show can be given for 10 cents, averaging an hour and consisting of three or four reels of film in which will be a pleasing variety of which some particular part must interest each one.

A show running an hour is an inducement for people to travel a distance to witness it, and one will feel repaid to come out during disagreeable weather for an hour's entertainment.

Shows universally must run 3,000 or 4,000 foot programs for a considerable period, depending on population, and receive increased prices before the manufacturers will be able to do their best in the way of producing long subjects of especial importance and interest, consisting of several reels on one theme which could be made so attractive that 10 cents or more could be drawn from every one with any desire for knowledge or entertainment. When this is done it would force exchanges to place the true valuation on real feature films and not regard each film as just a "reel" as at present. The present system prevents either exchange or exhibitor from placing a true value on an unusually good film, and it must be discouraging to a manufacturer to see it handled in exactly the same manner as a reel of worthless matter.

"Paramount policies are not borrowed from some other source," continued Mr. Hodkinson, "these policies have been carefully thought out and painstakingly worked out during a series of years to prove their true worth in practical operation. Briefly, Paramount policies are a high-grade feature program released regularly; better theaters to show it in; higher admission prices, and a better class of patrons. These policies were given their first trial by me in a small theater in Ogden, Utah, in 1907, at a time when practically every motion picture show charged 5 cents—but I charged 10 cents, ran a program, tried for quality instead of quantity, catered to a better class of people and ran my pictures one week. This began the development of a feature program, longer runs, higher admissions, better theaters, better patrons."

"THE ETERNAL CITY" AT THE ASTOR THEATER, NEW YORK CITY.

The film version of Hall Caine's masterly romance, "The Eternal City," produced by the Famous Players Film Co., and under the direction of Daniel Frohman, opened at the Astor Theater, New York City, on Monday evening, April 12, for an indefinite period. The house was filled with an enthusiastic audience which gave unmistakable evidence of its enjoyment as the engrossing story, with its scenes taken in Rome and London, was flashed upon the screen. The drama itself and the finished acting of Pauline Frederick, as Donna Roma; Thomas Holding, as David Rossi; Frank Losse, as Baron Bonelli; George Majeroni, as Dr. Roselli; Fuller Mellish, as Pope Pius XI; and Lottie Alter, as the Princess Bellini, form a complete and highly satisfactory entertainment; when, in addition, beautifully photographed views of the exact scenes of action are shown, embracing the Vatican Gardens, the Forum, the Coliseum, the Villa D'Est, and the Castle of St. Angelo, the pleasure derived from this remarkable photoplay is greatly enhanced.

An augmented orchestra gave a specially selected program during the unwinding of the eight reels, which consumed over two hours, one ten-minute intermission being allowed.

"An Elaborate Photo Spectacle," the Hall Caine drama is called on the program; it more than makes good the claim. Viola Allen, who created the role of Donna Roma in the stage version of "The Eternal City," was among the crowd of deeply interested spectators.

MARYLAND EXHIBITORS' BALL.

Big Gathering of Exhibitors and Photoplayers Marks the Second Annual Event at Baltimore.

THE second annual picture ball and banquet of the Maryland Exhibitors' League was perhaps one of the most successful events of its kind ever held in this section of the country. Given at the Lyric theater in Baltimore Saturday evening, April 10, the fifty actors and actresses from Lubin, Edison, Essanay, Vitagraph, World, Victor and Imp companies, were publicly introduced to an assemblage of nearly two thousand people. As each one of these was introduced by Marion S. Pearce, national president, from "Pop" Lubin, the veteran producer, down to little "Bobby" Connolly, the smallest and youngest of them all, there came a round of applause and calls for a few remarks to which there came a cordial response. However, these two were the heroes of both men and women and perhaps were accorded some of the applause that might have gone to others. James Young and his wife, Clara Kimball Young, won their way into the hearts of the throng when they announced that they were native Baltimoreans, and Baltimoreans, first, last and all the time.

There was one other whose place in the hearts of the people was easily seen, for Mayor Preston was cheered when his name was announced until the very rafters of the building seemed to tremble at the noise. Introduced as the "best mayor Baltimore ever had," he seemed to think that his eligibility for membership in the fraternity to be of greater importance for he blushingly admitted that he was an amateur picture actor, not perhaps in participating in a love theme of a drama, but in the drama of a big city, the pictures forming which show the activities of the government during his administration—the improvements to all things civic for the betterment of the people. These reels are to be used in the mayoralty campaign soon to open in which he is a candidate. He commented very favorably on the educational value of the motion picture films and told of how they could be used to advantage in the molding of the minds and brains of the young folks of the city.

The list of players who attended the ball is as follows:

Vitagraph—S. M. Spedon, Lillian Walker, Norma Talmadge, Edith Storey, Mary Maurice, Dorothy Kelly, Wally Van, Maurice Costello, James Morrison, "Hughie" Mack, "Bobby" Connolly, Tefft Johnson, Kate Price, Flora Finch, Nicholas Donaew.

Edison—Miriam Nesbit, Marc MacDermott, Gertrude McCoy, Augustus Phillips, Viola Dana, Herbert Prior, Edward Earle, Mabel Trunnelle.

Essanay—Francis X. Bushman.

World—Clara Kimball Young, James Young.

Victor—Brindsley Shaw, Rosemary Theby, Ben Wilson, Harry C. Meyers, Jennie Nelson.

Imp—King Baggot.

Spotlight dancing and exhibitions of the latest steps by professionals were other features of the evening, and there were many exclamations of regret when midnight brought the ball to a close.

Then followed the march to the banquet hall, where for the ensuing three hours every effort was made to make the event a memorable one. As the 150 or more guests were seated each was provided with a cap decorated with flags, jumping jacks, whistles and other novelties. The orchestra played a Southern melody and an army of ebony-hued waiters got into action.

"Maryland Hospitality" was the keynote of the evening, but so bounteous was this that it was practically impossible for the several speakers to make themselves heard in the far recesses of the banquet hall. President Pearce first made a short presentation speech by which J. Howard Bennett, to whom it was declared, as chairman of the committee in charge, much of the credit for the success of both ball and banquet was due, received a handsome three-handled silver loving cup. The surprise was too much for Mr. Bennett and thus one speech was crossed off the list.

Hon. William F. Broening, as toastmaster, paid a tribute to Messrs. Pearce and Scheck, the pioneers in the moving picture business of Baltimore, calling on the former for a few remarks.

Although many of the actors and actresses and the invited guests had an opportunity of telling what they thought of anything or everything, the one commercial talk of the evening was given by Mr. Lubin. In his remarks he sounded the warning of the dire results that are to come from the State censorship of moving pictures which seems to have had its inception in the very unfavorable law of Pennsylvania. He put the question directly to the players—it is up to them to defend their own interests. Speaking as an old man, fast approaching the end of life's journey, although in the next breath denying that he had passed the time when he could not go upon the stage and perhaps do better than the efforts of a misguided few, Mr. Lubin explained just how censorship was going to hit the pockets of those dependent for their livelihood upon the films.

Producers in Pennsylvania, he stated, are called upon to pay a tax of $2.50 for each film inspected. He denied this right of the government and declared it to be a discrimination because of the fact that newspapers and periodicals were not subjected to similar censorship. All this is going on, he said, right under the shadow of the Liberty Bell, and many other things which spell freedom to the people. With success in Pennsylvania from a financial standpoint, all of the other states will, without doubt, enact similar laws and his company alone will be forced to pay out nearly $50,000 per week in such taxes. He declared that the idea of the players that this tax would fall upon the exhibitors and the picture fans was erroneous—"It is going to come out of your pockets, from the salaries that you earn. With an enormous tax placed upon the producing companies, they will no longer be able to pay present salaries." He begged them to take some interest in this matter which so vitally affects them.

In his opinion, there is absolutely no need for censorship. Theater owners would not under any circumstances be allowed to show an improper picture. That should be sufficient. There is being produced in this country 6,000,000 feet of film a week and the enormous cost incident to censorship thereon is readily apparent.

"You will have to wake up," he told them. "You must organize. Do not allow politics to enter into and ruin the industry. Get your friends on the newspapers, the magazine writers, to aid you in showing that censorship is unnecessary. Wake up before it is too late, and do not forget that there is the possibility that some states might need a little more in the way of taxes and set their rate at $5 instead of $2.50."

Gathered around the tables, in addition to the photoplayers already mentioned, were: President Marion S. Pearce, Clement Weber, J. Howard Bennett, Guy L. Wonder, Mr. and Mrs. H. Cook, Mr. and Mrs. Charles A. Hicks, Maurice Hooker, Alice Flynn, Mrs. B. Depkin, Bernard Depkin, Mr. and Mrs. John Kieth, Mr. and Mrs. Harrington, James T. O'Neil, Thomas Tobin, Miss Grauss, E. Mendelsohn, Joe Bleckman, Mr. and Mrs. George P. Klein, Mr. and Mrs. F. H. Durkee, Miss Watt, E. B. McCurdy, J. Eberhardt, William Kalb and guest, Thomas L. Bohannan, Mrs. Edward Holtz, Rose Prunty, Wood Rolph, D. S. Spence, Mr. and Mrs. Lewy, Miss Darby, Nat Keene, Anna Lamberth, Marie Shipley, Clarence Stubbs, Harriet Hunt, Joe Brody, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Cunningham, John Robinette, J. R. Evans, E. G. Evans, D. Mackie, Jr., Mr. Hartman, Mr. Gephardt, Stanley Lowry, William Fait, Sr., Miss Vaughan, Mrs. W. Fait, William Fait, Jr., Raymond N. REORGANIZATION OF SAN FRANCISCO LEAGUE PROGRESSING.

The reorganization of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of San Francisco is being carried to a successful conclusion and it is anticipated that within a short time this branch will again be a power for good. The second mass meeting of exhibitors was held on the last Wednesday in March in the assembly hall of the Pacific Building, the quarters of the old organization at 948 Market street having proved too small. This meeting was attended by many of the leading moving picture men of the city who had never before taken part in organized effort of this kind and who declared their intention of joining the rehabilitated League.

In order to secure the best men possible for officers a nominating committee was named, consisting of H. J. Gosliner, Joseph Huff and Louis Greenfield. This committee will render its report at the next meeting, set for April 14th, and at this gathering officers will be chosen.

A committee consisting of I. Oppenheimer, H. J. Gosliner, Joseph Huff and Robert Abraham was appointed to see the proper authorities and ask that the taking of moving pictures upon the streets of the city be allowed. The work of a prominent company was recently stopped on account of the attention it attracted, but the exhibitors desire that work of this kind be encouraged, instead of hindered.

SAN FRANCISCO CONVENTION TO BE GRAND SUCCESS.

"It's simply wonderful," said M. E. Cory in speaking of the hearty support being accorded the committee in the arrangements that are being made for the national convention and exhibition which is to be held in San Francisco July 13th to 16th."

You see the manufacturers and the accessory men all realize that ever yexhibitor who can go anywhere this year is going to San Francisco as he will not only be able to attend the convention but will take in the great Panama Pacific Exposition. He will also be able to spend several days visiting the wonderful studios at Los Angeles, and probably attend the San Diego Exposition.

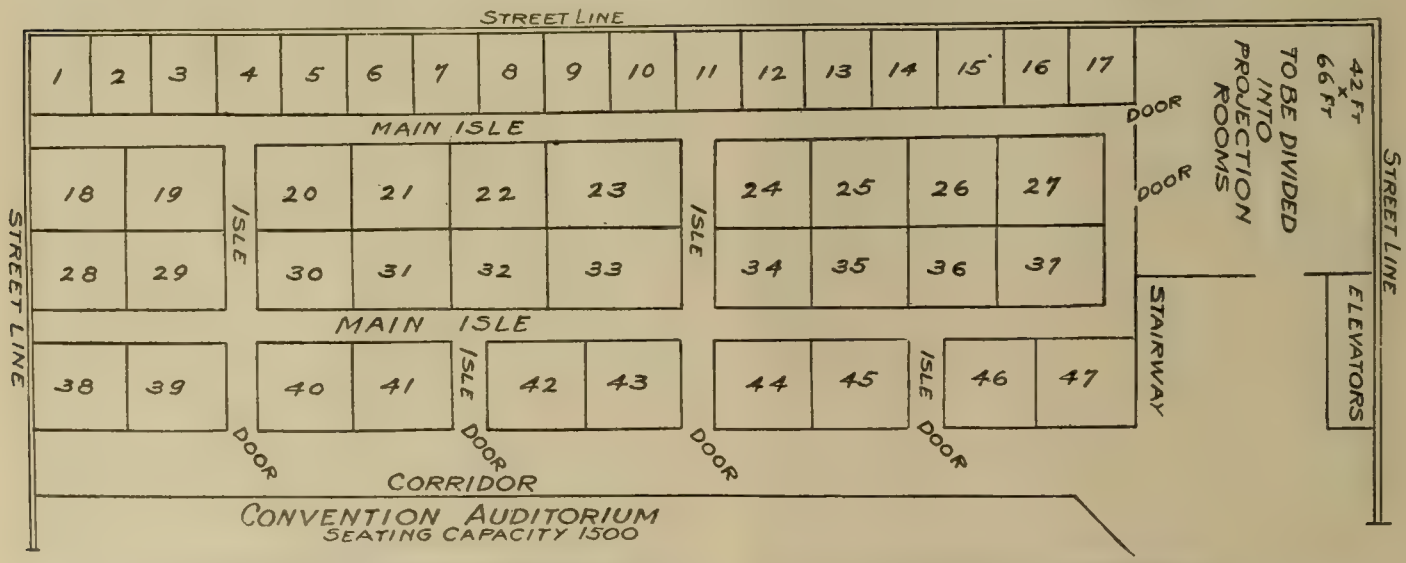
"Further, it is easy to see that the convention in San Francisco will give the western exhibitor a chance to attend. It is manifestly impossible for these boys in any great number to attend the conventions in the extreme east, the same as eastern men could not be expected to journey to San Francisco year after year.

"There will be at least fifteen hundred western exhibitors at this convention. These men are up-to-date, aggressive and liberal and quick buyers of anything that looks good to them.

"This will be a rare opportunity to get acquainted and place your products directly before a big new trade field."

KENTUCKY CONVENTION.

The Fourth Annual Convention of Kentucky Branch 7, M. P. E. L. of A., will be called to order by President L. J. Dittmar, at the Phoenix Hotel, Lexington, Ky., Wednesday, April 21st, and will adjourn with the final session on Thursday the 22nd. These dates were selected by the executive committee for the reason that the races start on the latter date, which insures special rates on all railroads, as well as extra entertainment for those who attend. An elaborate banquet will be given in the main dining room of the Phoenix on Wednesday night to which all will be invited. Entertainment by Ada Meade, and Orpheum Theater orchestras and performers and the running of un-released films. A special invitation will be mailed to supply houses in all branches of the trade to exhibit free and a large number is expected. National President N. S. Pearce of Baltimore, is expected and will address the convention and preside at the banquet. Everyone will have the right of full and free speech at all sessions when a complete set of officers will be elected and five delegates and five alternates to the Fourth Annual Convention of the National League, which will be



FLOOR PLAN OF EXPOSITION HALL AT THE SAN FRANCISCO CONVENTION.

Diagram shows excellent arrangement of booths. Unusual number of entrances and large projection rooms a feature.

The coming National Convention and Exposition of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League will be held in the new Civic Auditorium. This building forms part of the San Francisco Civic Center. It is a permanent building of steel and granite, four stories and basement. The building covers an entire square city block. The main auditorium in which the grand ball will be held is 190 feet square and when arranged with seats, together with the balcony, seats eleven thousand people. There are twenty-one other convention chambers in this great building. The Motion Picture Convention chamber adjoins the main auditorium and has a seating capacity of twelve hundred.

There are also plenty of committee and press rooms. Large, beautifully furnished ladies' parlors are another feature.

The Exposition of the Motion Picture Arts will be held in a salon the same size as the convention hall. In addition to the forty-seven large booths conveniently arranged and made very accessible by numerous isles, there will be two or more large projection rooms. These projection rooms will be equipped with the latest type machines, motors, screens, chairs and all appliances and will offer excellent facilities for the display of equipment and pictures.

held in San Francisco, Cal., July 6th. We feel it useless to urge the necessity of your attendance for you know as well as we the value of organization and only wish to call your attention to the fact that your State branch saved you once and the parent body through its able president and associates saved the exhibitors of the United States many thousands of dollars in special tax last fall. We simply ask that whether or not you are a member so long as you are an exhibitor, lay aside the cares of business, come to Lexington on the above dates and afford us the pleasure of entertaining you.

The attention of manufacturers is called to the excellent facilities for exhibiting their pictures and accessories afforded at this convention. Space has been provided in the hotel ball room for that purpose. Those unable to attend may have souvenirs and circulars distributed by forwarding the same to the convention committee.

For An Open Sunday.

A Big Meeting on Jersey City Heights Makes a Demonstration Against Sabbatarianism.

THE Peter Carl Association, composed of residents of Jersey City Heights, recently issued a call for a mass meeting to ascertain the local sentiment on the question of opening the motion picture theaters on Sunday. The mass meeting took place on Thursday, April 8, at Schindler's Hall, corner of Central avenue and Charles street, Jersey City Heights.

There was a very large attendance, the hall being found entirely inadequate to accommodate the crowds that had come to attend the meeting. The meeting was called to order and presided over by Frederick A. Henke, who explained briefly what the object of the meeting was and extended an invitation to all persons who wished to be heard upon either side of the question. The first speaker was one of the city officials, Commissioner Byrne. Mr. Byrne said he could not see any possible harm in opening the motion picture houses on Sunday. He thought that Jersey City Heights was being discriminated against, as the motion picture houses were allowed to open in other parts of Hudson County. The effect of this course he said was to drive the people to New York and spend their money there. Mr. Byrne was followed by W. Stephen Bush, of The Moving Picture World, whom the exhibitors had invited to attend the meeting and speak on their behalf. Mr. Bush said that the Sabbath was made for man. The notion that man was made for the Sabbath was the old notion of the Pharisees, who were the prototypes of the Sabbatarian fanatics of today. He quoted the late Mayor Gaynor's language to the effect that the "still Sabbath" was not known in the history of Christendom until the coming of the Puritans. Even at this day the British Isles alone in all Christendom persisted in observing and forcing upon others the old Pharisaical Sunday. The speaker then dwelt on the value and importance of the screen as an educator and he contended that the open motion picture theater on Sunday would be of value to the community at large because it occupied the people's minds in a wholesome fashion and would keep them from doing things that might be a good deal worse than going to a motion picture theater. He spoke of the open theaters in New York City, in Newark, in Atlantic City, and in other parts of New York and New Jersey, and asked whether any one was prepared to say that the public had suffered in any way through the Sunday opening in these localities. Rev. Dr. Parker, an elderly preacher, warmly opposed the Sunday opening. He said he understood from creditable sources that a great film trust was behind this movement for an open Sunday. He was asked by Mr. Bush to be specific and state his information openly. The reverend gentleman declined to do this, but repeated that it "had been credibly reported to him that such was the case." He then launched forth into a fierce denunciation of Sunday baseball and Sunday motion picture shows and prophesied that the "Church of Christ," which he claimed to represent, authoritatively would sweep the motion picture on to its final destruction if impious hands were laid on the Sabbath.

Ex-Assemblyman Joseph Carroll spoke in favor of a modern and liberal Sunday, giving his reasons therefor at some length. The meeting adjourned without passing any resolution or taking any action, but it was apparent that the great majority of those present were in favor of opening the motion picture houses for at least a few hours on Sundays.

A Farnum is building a picture theater at Alici, Minn., which is a suburb of Hibbing. Another theater of the same kind is being erected at Carson Lake, Minn. This latter mentioned house will seat 250, and ought to be a paying proposition as Carson Lake is a mining location.

NATIONAL CENSORS DEFINE POSITION.

The attitude of the National Board of Censorship toward D. W. Griffith's "The Birth of a Nation" is expressed in a statement signed W. D. McGuire, Jr., executive secretary. On January 20th the picture was viewed and passed by a section of the censoring committee; but later, at the request of Frederick C. Howe, chairman of the board, the film was shown before the general committee. Several suggested alterations were acted upon by the producers. Again the picture was reviewed by the general committee, two additional modifications were requested and these having been made the picture was passed.

The statement declares that whether a play is historically accurate or not does not concern the National Board, for it is stated in the printed standards that "the National Board does not regard itself as a censor of accuracy, unless the inaccuracy in question is of the kind that will result in some concrete disaster to the person whom the inaccuracy misleads." As an illustration of this, the board would not approve a film conveying under the guise of scientific truth the idea that tuberculosis can be cured by means of patent medicines.

It is further claimed that a board of censorship for motion pictures or dramatic productions should confine itself entirely to the consideration as to whether a given production is objectionable from a standpoint of public morals. If it can pass this test, it should be permitted. If not, it should be stopped. Public authorities have no more right to interfere with the production of a play or motion picture which emphasizes the southern point of view of our great conflict and the subsequent period of reconstruction than that of a play which lays emphasis upon the northern point of view.

NEIGHBORHOOD HOUSES ORGANIZE.

An organization of the neighborhood moving picture houses has been perfected in the city of Denver, for the special purpose of protection to the small exhibitors, about thirty-five houses having joined the organization, viz: The Denver Motion Picture Exhibitors' League. George A. Killam, of the York Theater, located on Capitol Hill, surrounded by the most exclusive residences, was elected president and Mr. J. R. Claypool, of the Ozz Theater, was elected secretary and treasurer.

One of the prime objects of the organization is the use of "features" by the small houses without having to pay for "regular service" at the same time. The neighborhood exhibitor, feeling that his people, as well as the down town patrons, are entitled to the best pictures in the market, and to secure features from companies not having offices or representatives in Denver, as well as those now represented in the city. Efforts of the organization has recently secured the passage of a new city ordinance adjusting the license tax according to the seating capacity, which is the only fair and equitable tax.

IMPORTANT CONVENTION NOTICE.

All communications regarding the National Convention should be addressed to the convention committee, 306 Mechanic Bank Building, San Francisco, Cal.

The committee will gladly supply you with full information regarding railroad rates and routes, stopover privileges and things worth seeing enroute.

Hotel accommodations will be reserved. Information or assistance of any nature whatsoever gladly given.

M. E. CORY IN TOWN.

M. E. Cory, chairman of the Exhibitors' League Convention Committee, who is working up a little interest in New York in the big meeting at San Francisco in July, reports that the first contract for space at the moving picture men's exhibition has been signed by Joe Brandt for the Universal. Harry Reichenback, acting for the Metro Films Corporation, has captured the first two tickets on the big special train which is to go through solid from New York to San Francisco. The Metro has also taken space on the exhibition floor.

CANADIAN FILM EXCHANGE BURNED.

The Canadian Universal Film Company's establishment at Toronto, Canada, was destroyed by fire on Sunday, April 11. Manager Hague says that the loss is about $75,000. The fire is thought to have been of incendiary origin. A new stock of pictures has been secured and business continued as usual.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Stage Versus Photodramatic Production.

WILLIAM A. BRADY'S big spectacle, "Life," is running at the Auditorium just now. Percy Hammond, the able dramatic critic of the Chicago Tribune, in one of his recent Sunday articles, contrasts the imposing stage settings of this production with the exteriors of moving pictures, and also certain stage incidents with what they would be as registered by the camera. Mr. Hammond writes in part:

Mr. Brady is an acknowl .ged master of the knack of scenic melodrama, and the effects he gets with mechanism, lights and canvas are the best, not excepting those of Drury Lane.

Their day is about past, however, and Mr. Brady himself contributes evidence of their waning in "Life" his current spectacle at the Auditorium. No matter how shrewd a producer may be in his counterfeit of outdoor scenes, he cannot cope with the cinema. His exteriors are palpably spurious having a minimum of resemblance to the objects they seek to represent. His rivers, his trees, his skies, are mere daubed wood and cloth. In "Life" Mr. Brady accentuates these shortcomings of the spectacular scene painter by placing in juxtaposition with them actual things duplicated by the camera. There is a boat race in "Life" with many of the animated preliminaries reproduced via he film-. Following this the curtain ascends on the scene mechanics' idea of an observation train. It is crowded with spectators and it moves, but it is no more like an observation train than "Life" is like life. Subsequent episodes, the actual boat race, and later, the automobile chase, are pictures much more plausible—the best, in fact, that I have ever seen in a theater. But they do not rank with the cinema in the production of illusions.

Mayor Harrison Sued for Theater License.

In several preceding issues reference was made to the contention existing between the Hyde Park Presbyterian Church trustees and the owners of the Harper theater, nearby, at Fifty-third street and Harper avenue.

The owner failed to obtain the consent of the trustees to the operation of a moving picture show in this theater, after making the concession that the films could be censored by the trustees; so a petition has been filed in the Circuit Court, directed against Mayor Carter H. Harrison and City Clerk Connery. The petition alleges that these officials have refused to grant a license to the treater on the ground that it is within 200 feet of the church, and thus, in violation of the ordinance, forbidding the operation of a theater within that limit. The petition recites that the main entrance of the church is more than 300 feet from the front entrance of the theater and further, that the ordinance forbidding a theater within 200 feet of a church is unconstitutional and invalid.

The partition asserts that 700 residents of Hyde Park have signed a petition that the license be granted.

The fact that the petition has been filed shows that A. E. Martin, present owner of the Harper, has decided not to accept the offer of a negro congregation anxious to obtain a lease of the theater. It also shows that the trustees of the Hyde Park Presbyterian Church have refused to budge from their original position; namely, that the theater must not be opened.

Story of Chicago's Plan in Moving Pictures.

At my request Walter D. Moody, managing director of the Chicago Plan Commission, has kindly written an explanatory story of the work of the Commission in connection with the production of "A Tale of One City."

"The production of a city planning subject in motion pictures has attracted widespread attention," writes Mr. Moody. "The idea grew out of the educational work of the Chicago Plan Commission. When it was first announced that motion pictures were to be used to advance the idea of the Plan of Chicago, there were few who understood how this subject could find comprehensive and intelligent expression in film form.

"Since the opening night of 'A Tale of One City' at the Majestic theater, the Plan Commission has been flooded with inquiries concerning the films, and is the recipient of many congratulatory letters from celebrated architects, lawyers, municipal administrators, merchants, clergymen, real estate dealers, school authorities, park officials and other community leaders. All agree that the idea is unique, extremely valuable, and that the film production is exceedingly interesting and highly instructive.

"The Chicago Plan Commission has attracted world-wide attention in its promotion and development of the plan of Chicago. This is the most comprehensive city plan ever created for the orderly development of a city, with the possible exception of the great Haussmann plan for Paris, which, when realized, made the French capital the most attractive and convenient large city in the world.

"The great issue confronting American cities is how to make their expanding growth conform to orderly development, in accordance with a scientific plan. One hundred and eighty-three cities in the United States are now engaged in city planning. The eyes of the world are focused on Chicago as the world's arena of startling and effective city planning effort. The proposals in the plan of Chicago for street, park, waterfront and transportation improvements are gigantic and dramatic, to say the least.

"Early in its work the Plan Commission prepared a textbook on right citizenship and city planning. This was at once adopted by the Chicago Board of Education as a part of the school curriculum for the Eighth Grade course. This is the first instance of a school board in America departing from traditional precedent to admit the study of a textbook on such a subject. Forty-five thousand copies have been printed and distributed to the school children of the world's fourth city. This textbook, entitled 'Wacker's Manual of the Plan of Chicago,' in honor of the distinguished chairman of the Commission, Charles H. Wacker, and written by me, has attracted widespread attention in Europe, and has been reviewed in the leading educational journals of Paris and Berlin.

"Thirty-six cities in 13 foreign countries have directly inquired from the Chicago Plan Commission how its work was being conducted, and have asked for copies of its literature. One hundred and ten cities in America have asked the Commission for advice and asistance, and to supplement this wide appeal, as well as to further the unique educational propaganda of the Commission at home, 'A Tale of One City' has been produced.

"The lecturers of the Commission have delivered in Chicago more than 300 stereopticon lectures, speaking directly to 100,000 people. Requests for these lectures, which contain remarkable scenes from 24 countries of the world, have been made to the Commission by cities everywhere throughout the United States. It is not difficult to imagine that since the subject of the great Chicago Plan has been put up in film form that 'A Tale of One City' will be in demand everywhere. This is already indicated in the large number of bookings received and daily being received by the Educational Films Association which, under the direction of the Chicago Plan Commission, produced 'A Tale of One City.'"

Chicago Film Brevities.

The premier presentation of "The Lady of the Snows" at the Keystone theater, on Sheridan Road, April 6th, was a great success. Mrs. Carter Harrison, with a large party of dinner guests and many other fashionables, attended the evening exhibition at 8:30 o'clock. It may be mentioned again that Mrs. Harrison is the author of the book and the scenario of that title. Everyone present was much pleased with the visualization of the story.

Mandamus proceedings against Major Funkhouser and the city are threatened in the immediate future by the promoters of "Twilight Sleep," unless permission is granted to exhibit that subject. Herman Frank, a lawyer, after seeing the picture, stated that there is nothing in the film either "immoral, obscene, or likely to disturb the public peace," and announced that he would immediately begin work on the petition for a writ of mandamus, which he will present in court in a few days. He contends that Major Funkhouser cannot withhold legally a permit for the exhibition of the film. Major Funkhouser has decide dto take another view of the film.

Jones, Linick & Schaefer, of this city, have announced that they will build a new moving picture theater, in the near future, on State street, between Jackson and Van Buren. The new house will have 100 feet frontage on State and will be named the Strand. Mr. Jones believes that the Strand will be one of the most modernly constructed and appointed moving picture theaters in the country. There will be a mezzanine floor and a balcony, and the entire seating capacity will be 2,500. It is expected that work will be begun in about two or three months. It is estimated that the Strand will cost about $600,000.

The Rex theater, Milwaukee, suffered from a panic on Saturday evening, April 10, and many women and children narrowly escaped serious injuries. The burning of a film in the operator's room was the cause.

The opening of the Fine Arts theater Saturday, April 10, under the management of Alfred Hamburger, with "The Avenging Conscience" as the screen attraction, was a most successful event. The daily papers gave liberal praise to the presentation and all pronounced this fine film subject one of the best yet viewed.

Walker Whiteside in "The Melting Pot"

WALKER WHITESIDE, who has joined the forces of John Cort in the making of feature photoplays, told a representative of the Moving Picture World this week why he chose Israel Zangwill's great drama, "The Melting Pot," as the vehicle of his first venture into the motion picture field. Mr. Whiteside is finishing "The Melting Pot" at a studio in Bayonne for the Cort Film Corporation as the first of several pictures which he will make under the management of Mr. Cort, and his picture will stand as the initial feature production.

Walker Whiteside.

"We have chosen 'The Melting Pot,'" said Mr. Whiteside, "because we consider it the greatest story with a purpose which could be put on right at this time when the silent struggle, which has been going on for years underneath the surface of human government and business, has burst forth into the abnormal war waged in Europe at the present time.

"'The Melting Pot' is not being put on as a blow at any institution. It has been taken from the play of Mr. Zangwill and picturized for the motion pictures 'with malice toward none and charity for all.' If it shows the baser passions of hate and oppression as contrasted with the loftier ones of love and compassion, it is not the fault of anything but the facts set forth with all the dramatic power of a master. When it shows the unfair power of one monarch over more than half the area of Europe, nothing but the truth is heard.

"And, finally, when the analysis is complete, we find America and Americanism leveling all race hatred and prejudices and putting out a protecting wing which brings, even to the Jew, the persecuted of the ages, the triumph of peace, contentment and happiness.

"There can be no greater story brought to the American public, as constituted today, than the story of a flight from oppression and a struggle for existence in the land of liberty. That has been the history of the United States from the hour the first settler landed on these shores. It has been the life history of almost every individual who has voyaged to these shores since then.

"If 'The Melting Pot' carries no other lesson, it ought to make every man, woman and child rejoice in the right to live and work in America."

Albert Capellani.

The Man Who Made "Les Miserables" Joins World Film Staff of Directors.

ALBERT CAPELLANI, the famous French director, is the latest addition to the staff of the World Film directors. His reputation has preceded him to this country, he being best known in America because of his masterful production of "Les Miserables," which justly created a furore throughout the entire world. Abroad he is considered an authority, and is affectionately called the "Father of Artistry in Filmdom," for he was one of the first to utilize the services of famous dramatic artists in picturizations of great plays. Much of the general excellence of pictures may be directly traced to Mr. Cappellani and his advanced ideas regarding the possibilities of the photoplay.

Albert Capellani.

Mr. Capellani was born and raised in Paris. His picture experience covers twelve years, that time being spent with but two companies. For five years he was director with Pathe Freres, and for seven years he was managing director and producer with La Societe de Auteurs et Geuns de Lettres (S. C. A. G. L.). With both concerns he was a pioneer in making better and more artistic pictures, and their loss is America's gain, for Mr. Capellani will surely be a brilliant acquisition to both the World Film and American picturedom in general.

When Mr. Capellani first became interested in the making of pictures, there was hardly such a thing as a coherent picture play. The work was practically confined to scenics, chases, and the showing of motion. There were a few alleged comedies and a pitifully few dramatic stories used in pictures, but they were very crude. Even so, they claimed Mr. Capellani's attention, and he soon conceived something a little better than had ever been presented on the screen. He applied his ideas, and his results justified his experiments. From that time on he has been a pioneer in ideas, all tending toward the betterment of pictures and the utilization of the best possible plays and talent.

For the past few years Mr. Capellani has devoted himself exclusively to the production of big plays in which the foremost artists of Europe were engaged. He personally invaded the sacred precincts of the foremost theaters of the continent and succeeded in persuading the famous artists to appear on the screen. At first his task was difficult, but now it is considered an honor to be in the cast of a Capellani production.

Mr. Capellani has scored tremendous successes with his picturized versions of the stories of Victor Hugo, Zola and Alphonse Daudet. He is a thorough student of the French classics in literature, as well as a practical picture producer; therefore his finished efforts are exceptional in their completeness of detail. He has several important productions scheduled with the World Film Corporation, and much may be expected from Mr. Capellani. Fortunately, he will not be handicapped in the matter of language, for he speaks English fluently.

Since the opening of automobile and wagon routes to the deserts and mountains, many companies have taken advantage of the weather and made long trips to secure different settings for many pictures. Helen Holmes and J. P. McGowan, the director of the hazardous "Hazards" series, which is being continued indefinitely, are doing a wire tapping stunt this week in which the real thing is used. The company is now made up of real railroaders who have been made into actors by the veteran director. By the way, the intrepid director is practically recovered from his terrible fall of some months ago and is now walking about as usual. He will again don make up and appear as the heavy in coming pictures.

Gene Gauntier and her director-lead are at work this week on the first picture since their arrival at Universal City. It is "Hearts in Exile" and was written by Miss Gauntier, which is a story of the great northwest.

At last Ince's "The Sign of the Rose" is to be put on in grand style at Clune's Auditorium under the supervision of Lloyd Brown, manager of the mammoth film theater. The first night run is being anticipated by thousands of film fans and it will be given a great run here. George Beban and players are all ready to appear in real life during the last scenes of the great play.

Robert Grey, who is now with the Keystone company, suffered a painful injury in an automobile crash a few days ago in this city. He is in a serious condition at the Pacific hospital.

William D. Taylor, while waiting to start his next picture with Carlyle Blackwell, is producing "Damon and Pythias" at a local theater for the "Knights," and is making good, too, and it is some time since he had been behind the scenes instead of under the diffusers.

Studios and Studio Organization

A Live Topic Intelligently Discussed by a Practical Architect.

THE "made in America" animated picture in the interest of its stories, quality of its technique and photography as well as in its dramatic, pictorial and comic cohesion, is fast taking its place in the front ranks of the motion picture industry, and the present war has nothing to do with its ascendency, so Edward Barnard Kinsila, a technical expert with an extended experience in Europe, declares authoritatively.

Mr. Kinsila was one of the first Americans interested in films, to build studios abroad and is the designer and builder of the newer form of daylight studios in America. He built the Peerless studio at Fort Lee, N. J., probably one of the largest and most efficient studios in America to-day.

Mr. Kinsila has specialized in studio construction and equipment, and his views and reflections illuminate angles of the art and industry heretofore not generally discussed or understood. In a chat with a representative of The Moving Picture World, Mr. Kinsila said:

"After I had completed the Nollendorf Theater in Berlin, Germany, I was besieged with inquiries covering the whole field of the motion picture industry. Accompanying the inquiries were several commissions for studio construction. Before undertaking the erection of a studio I thought it wise to thoroughly inform myself about their requirements. With that thought in view I visited all the prominent studios in Europe, and carefully studied their equipment and arrangement. A personal acquaintance with Bacon Facine, director general of the Cines, and Mons. Gaumont, proved of valuable assistance.

"The finest studio I saw at that time in Europe was built by an American, Joseph Minchen, near Paris. I had given Minchen his first ideas of the business and naturally rejoiced over his accomplishment. This studio contained every facility known at that time for making pictures and was a fine tribute to the American painstaking mind of the builder. My visit to this remarkable studio impressed me more fully with the possibilities of proper studio construction in America. In any event. I firmly resolved to absorb all the ideas obtainable for future use in my native land.

"No architect not a specialist may hope to build well a successful and thoroughly equipped daylight studio. He must know accurately what is required and its proper disposition to secure the greatest efficiency.

"The very location of the studio is important. It must be convenient and command the best light, its placement according to the points of the compass, so that it may get the full light the greatest number of working hours, and the angle of its exposed glass roof must be such as to receive the actinic rays direct, and not obliquely, in the winter months, when light is most needed. Provision must be made for uninterrupted lateral light, and the construction must be skeleton to obviate possible shadows. The texture of the glass itself is of vital importance. Ordinary commercial glass of arsenic or manganate composition eats up the light rays that are needed. Then there is the efficient disposition of the various auxiliary departments. Mistakes in these important details mean added expense and poor results.

"The popularity of American pictures at that time was just beginning in Europe. They were mainly comic or sensational and were used to fill out the lengthy feature programs, that are just now entering into popularity in this country. The American photography was generally bad, the acting and stage direction deplorably inefficient in detail. Actors appeared in plays obviously of early periods in modern clothes. Young actors played old or character parts in wigs, crimp beards and highly exaggerated make-ups. Youthful girls were portrayed by matronly looking women. Austrian soldiers in these American made films appeared dressed in British uniforms and vice versa. The roles of household and personal servants were played by men and women ludicrously ignorant of the duties of the characters. Liveried footmen, for instance, at the entrance doors of private houses, serenely neglected to relieve visitors of their hand luggage or failed to tuck in departing women with carriage robes. Sartorial faux pas occurred ad nauseum. At formal evening parties gentlemen present wore informal dinner jackets and black ties, and the ladies present never smiled or betrayed their censure.

"But these faults are rapidly being corrected. The picture business is making giant strides in America, as evidenced by the stupendous production of "The Birth of a Nation," done by a master mind regardless of expense. Competition and combination are as usual accomplishing big things. The enormous profits may have induced adventuresome imitators to embark into a business that they do not understand, but the result is inevitable. Firms may spring up over night, but there always remains the survival of the fittest.

"Future producers must not only produce but control their output. Success will come only to those who give the most for the least cost. The market to-day is glutted with picturized versions of stage successes at exorbitant royalties, with titles played by the original stars, also at high figures, who more often signally fail than otherwise.

"Some of these plays deal with sex problems unfitted for the screen. The masses who patronize the picture theaters may not be more moral than their neighbors, but they certainly are more prudish and rarely interested in the scenes of an adventuress. This is especially true in the smaller towns that form the back bone of the earning power of the pictures.

"But regardless of the type of play, the manner of its production must be considered. Picture makers in America have discovered the superiority of daylight photography, and in consequence, nearly all the large companies are taking their important scenes on large open platforms near Los Angeles, California. In the east open platforms are only possible a few weeks in the year, and a proper glass enclosure is imperative.

"These enclosed studios should contain all the up-to-date devices for picture taking; spacious water tanks equipped with special wave making machinery, where perfect pictures may be taken beneath a raging sea surface as actual sea incidents; and revolving cycloramic platforms for miniature photography from perfect working models. It is a useless expenditure of money to photograph train wrecks and large catastrophes from real life. This may be much better done with working models and close-ups. I was present at the taking of the scene in "Quo Vadis" of the lions devouring the Christians, and held one of these ferocious looking lions in my arms. It was only a playful little cub that the close up had converted into a veritable man eater.

"With large efficient studios, better organization must follow, meaning a material decrease in the cost of production. The monthly savings produced by perfect organization would amount to thousands of dollars, not hundreds. Many faults contribute to this great waste of money. The wide authority given directors is the principal one. Just think of a theatrical stage producer, whose position is equivalent to that of a picture director, being given carte blanche to produce a play. Still this is what is given the picture director. He often chooses the scenario, usually selects the cast, always dictates what the scenery, properties and the costumes will be, besides perfecting the scenario and producing all the effects in the play.

"Each concern should have a capable business manager, who would supervise the entire business. Then should come the heads of departments, each vested with complete authority. First should be the chief scenario editor, a competent literary man with dramatic ability. The employment of women for this important work is all wrong. Women being of negative composition rather than positive, lack virility and rarely comprehend the man's point of view. They nearly always miss the ever important psychological phase of the subject.

"Next comes the technical director, educated and artistic, who will supervise the entire preparation of the scenery, properties, costumes and locales. He should have a draftsman to design his sceneries and properties, and an artistic assistant to aid in the selection of costumes and sites for exterior views.

"After a conference of the heads of the departments, the cast director, a cold theatrical man accustomed to engaging actors, should select the cast, individual members of which the director may be privileged to reject as unsuited. Such an arrangement would soon eliminate the curse of favorites.

"By such organization it should be possible to clearly fix the time for the making of each scene and thus avoid scores of actors waiting about for hours, and often days, already made up. Under existing conditions, such results are impossible. I have seen the scene set and everything in apparent readiness, when the director would suddenly discover the absence of a necessary red rose. He then immediately roared: "Where in H—— is that red rose?" and ultimately the scene was delayed hours while some one traveled to the city florist and returned with the missing rose.

"Types too, rather than stage actors, are required for motion pictures. Ordinarily, the good stage actor is an utter failure on the screen. The successful picture stars begin with no set notions about acting, and are easily taught to be natural. This can be just as easily done with a perfect type. If the heads of departments have fully familiarized themselves with the complete scenario, the necessary types are not difficult to procure.

"If this be all properly attended to, and each head of a department held accountable for the work of his department, the scenes should all be ready on schedule time with nothing to interfere except possible light conditions. The director is then free to invent and determine the necessary "business" to embellish the play, memorizing with the aid of his assistant's notes, the minor, yet important details covering all the logical incidents of each scene, so that when presented in its entirety it has logical continuity. He may never assume to insult the intelligence of his audience by taking false liberties. The public are becoming more critical each day and their criticism is potent.

"Each studio should also have a competent chief camera man who sole duty would be to look after the setting and focusing of every camera. The cranking is mechanical, and can be with a little practice, done by a boy after the camera is set. Qualified camera men only, however, should go out for exteriors, because of the artistic composition and other photographic requisites.

"Incidentally the players should all be informed of the necessity of slow and deliberate action. The closer to the camera the slower the action. The human mind is only capable of appreciating one action at a time, and only the action made slowly registers.

"More skill is necessary in the camera work than is commonly given that component. All interior scenes, where possible, should first be shown in panorama, to give the public a clearer appreciation of the entire scene.

"Where players leave one room to enter another, two cameras should be used so as to preserve facial expressions and actions. For the same reason, a second camera should be used in making a close-up, unless the European method of a worm-screw swinging platform be used.

"To-day is the day of good features, and the makers are fast appreciating that good films in all the essentials I have indicated spell success. The future of the picture business was never so promising as it is to-day."

Miss Fania Marinoff

FRESH from her triumphs in recent Broadway successes, Miss Fania Marinoff has been engaged by the Kalem Company to enact the leading role in a forthcoming three-act Broadway Favorites feature.

As an artiste, Miss Marinoff bears an exceedingly enviable reputation. The marked ability she has shown in portraying emotional roles has made her a prime favorite with theatergoers. According to Kalem, the character Miss Marinoff is to portray in the Broadway Favorites production is admirably suited to her peculiar talents.

Fania Marinoff.

Miss Marinoff's record of achievements is a notable one. The latest of the Broadway Favorites stars has appeared in such productions as "The House Next Door," which was staged at the Gaiety Theater; "Romance of the Underworld," which had a successful run at the Fifth Avenue Theater; "Consequences," produced at the Comedy Theater, and more recently "A Thousand Years Ago," which finished a successful engagement at the Shubert Theater.

The title of the three-act Broadway Favorites production in which Miss Marinoff will be featured will be divulged at an early date. The star will work under the direction of Kenean Buel. Miss Marinoff is now on her way to the Kalem studios at Jacksonville, Fla.

Joseph A. De Pesa

TO STATE that an individual is one of the most capable publicity men in the New England States is conceding a great deal. However, this statement is none too broad when the press agenting abilities of Joseph A. Di Pesa, the publicity director of the New England branch of the Universal Film Exchange are to be discussed. "Joe," as he is familiarly known to his newspaper and moving picture associates, has always kept the name of any enterprise, which he has handled, well in the foreground.

Mr. Di Pesa was born and bred in the North End of Boston. He began his newspaper career in 1898, when he joined the city staff of the Boston Traveller, after graduating from the Boston English High School. When Hearst established the Boston American in 1904, Mr. Di Pesa became a member of its staff. He remained there for a few years and again returned to the Traveller, resigning in 1911, when he assumed the duties of press representative of the Plymouth Theater, Boston, which, at that time, was a Liebler playhouse. For a year prior to this "Joe" was the personal press representative of Florencio Constantino, the famed Spanish grand opera tenor.

Joseph A. Di Pesa.

His abilities as a publicity man have been well demonstrated since that time. Almost every day one will read some interesting story in the Boston newspapers concerning the Plymouth Theater. They are not of the ordinary press agent "faked" type, but are real news stories such as any live publication always welcomes.

When Gordon's Olympia Theater and the Scollay Square Olympia Theater, two of Boston's most up-to-date photoplay houses, were opened, the advance matter was handled by Mr. Di Pesa in a most creditable manner.

The greatest publicity campaign ever conducted in the interests of a social event in New England was handled by Mr. Di Pesa when he acted as press representative for the second annual ball of the Massachusetts Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, which was run in the Boston Arena, last December. This affair was universally acknowledged to be the greatest social affair in the history of Boston. In three weeks "Joe" secured over seventy-five columns of newspaper space, exclusive of the paid advertising.

It was not an easy task to secure such an amount of space from the Boston editors. When Mr. Di Pesa first informed them that a large number of screen artists would appear and that Mary Pickford would lead the grand march with Governor David I. Walsh, he was ridiculed. His persistence, however, proved a winner and when these newspaper men learned that some of the country's most famed film stars were at this affair, they not only sent their staff reporters to cover the ball but assigned many of their best writers to interview the stars for Sunday stories.

"Joe's" only regret is that he was unable to attend this event, which he handled so well. On the day that it was held he was stricken suddenly ill and confined to his bed for two weeks.

Mr. Di Pesa has now been engaged by Manager J. A. Eslow of the New England Universal Film Exchange to act as the publicity director for his office and if past accomplishments are to be taken as a giude, it is safe to say that the time is not far distant when Universal productions will be well known to every New England desident.

VIRGINIA PEARSON IN PHOTOPLAYS.

Miss Virginia Pearson, well known for her excellent work in several Broadway productions in recent seasons, has returned to her first love, and yesterday became a member of the Vitagraph forces. Miss Pearson made her first appearance on the screen in several Vitagraph productions, and she has rejoined the players of that company to appear in a number of new roles. Miss Pearson plans to create several difficult parts for her coming screen appearances.

Arthur Johnson, Leading Man

By Thornton Fisher.

"PRETTY soft today," said little Lottie Briscoe a few days ago when I went down to the Lubin studio in Philadelphia. Little Lottie was snugly esconced in a big easy chair in her dressing room, hadn't worked a lick all day and wasn't going to either. "The only time I

THAT'S IT, LOTTIE, LET THE VILLAIN CLOUT YA AND THEN I COME IN AND MUSS HIM UP!
HEAVEN WILL PERTECT THE POOR WOIKING GOIL!
LOTTIE B.
THORNTON FISHER — Philadelphia
ARTHUR JOHNSON

can rest in the studio," continued Miss Briscoe, "is when Mr. Johnson is away." Let me explain that the above statement was not intended as a "knock," but rather as a subtle compliment to Mr. Johnson's prodigious capacity for work. F'r instance, when the first rumblings of the milkman's wagon disturbs the silence of the early morning hours, Arthur takes a slant at his alarm clock, slips out of the downy couch, dresses and grabs the first car for the studio out in North Philadelphia, where he waits until the yawning, stretching doorman appears to admit him. Anyway, that is pretty near the truth, for this star is one of the first at the plant and the last to leave. While he is there he works, and so does everyone who plays under his direction, for Johnson is a director, too. Hence the sweet repose of his leading lady during his absence.

Arthur Johnson made an auspicious start toward the Presidency; he was born in Ohio—Cincinnati, to be exact—but while still a youngster the family moved to Davenport, Iowa, where his father became pastor of Trinity Church, thus spoiling Arthur's chances for a political career. Then the boy went to Kemper Hall Military School, but his father, who didn't raise his boy to be a soldier, longed deeply for the lad to enter the ministry. This did not appeal to young Johnson, who was devoting his attention to neighborhood theatricals and brimming over with an ambition to become an actor.

One day after the family had moved to Chicago a show came to town and with it opportunity. Then and there the boy decided on his future and succeeded in persuading his father to request the manager of the show to give him (the lad) a place in the company. It so happened that the manager was a friend of the elder Johnson, and the result—well, Arthur landed his first berth as a regular actor with a road company. His initial role was Lybalt in "Romeo and Juliet," and thereafter he continued in Shakespeare for some time, later varying his experience with work in melodrama, all the time storing away a valuable fund of knowledge of dramatics which has resulted in the conspicuous success he has achieved in his work for the film. Among those with whom he played in those days were Robert Mantell and Sol Smith Russell. One summer, seven years ago, Lawrence Griffith told Johnson that Biograph was looking for a man and suggested that he try the pictures. Johnson fell in with the idea and joined the Biograph, where he played opposite the little girl who has since won international renown, Mary Pickford, and who, by the way, was but beginning her career in the "movies."

Leaving Biograph, he went with Reliance, where he worked for a period, only to return to the speaking stage for a year. And only for a year, because that assiduous picture bee began again to buzz about Arthur's hearing apparatus and finally bit him. That was enough, and this time the young actor packed his old hair trunk and beat it for that place where the cameras clicketh and the actors acteth, said place being the Lubin studio.

I imagine that genial "Pop" Lubin must have seen Arthur coming and prepared a good story for his delectation, for friend Arthur stuck to the Lubin forces and has been there ever since. Anyone coming within range of "Pop" Lubin's humor will stick around awhile, you can bet your last sou on that.

It did not take the public long to acclaim the young actor a star, and with his ascent they added a few extra responsibilities by making him a director. Johnson has also revealed himself to be a clever comedian, which is indicative of his versatility. Arthur likes poetry, and on certain occasions will recite for the entertainment of his friends and the boys at the studio will agree that Arthur is some little reciter, too.

Here is a busy man who in his leisure moments, which are few, thoroughly enjoys burying himself in Shakespeare's works, his favorite reading; and for open air sport his motor car takes first place. But his work in the studio is the important thing, and when he is not in his accustomed place at the studio he is missed just as you would miss your dinner if you are not on a diet. He is an essential cog in the great machinery down there, and it must be something unusual that calls him away. I said above that Lottie Briscoe was loafing that day and she was, for it was Saturday before Washington's Birthday and Mr. Johnson had a very important engagement for the day—he quietly left and made a trip to Massachusetts to visit his mother.

EVA UNSELL LEASES FAMOUS PLAYERS.

Eva Unsell, who has been associated with the scenario department of the Famous Players Film Company since a few months after the inception of that concern, has resigned from this connection in order to devote her time to adaptations of famous plays and novels for leading feature concerns, on a free lance basis. Throughout her long connection with the Famous Players she has become familiar with every branch of plot-construction, and has a mastery of the principles that determine the availability and desirability of a play or novel for the screen.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

PICTURES! What are pictures? What percentage of the population of the great city of New York take an interest in pictures? How many in one thousand know of the Metropolitan Museum of Art? Some may read about it, others do not know the location of the building. But most of those who do form a most interesting group to the observer. They say: "I never knew that this was here before." They stand off and look at the "Horse Fair," for instance. "Don't those animals look 'natchul'?" They see more, sometimes, than the trained artist. He has hit the target. That horse picture in the Metropolitan Museum of Art is a winner with people of all means. The picture of autumn is also nice—the speedy motion it has. And then we find the poor, lone woman swept by the tide at the base of the rocks. The city that provides an art gallery with so many inspirations should be commended.

But what about people who do not go to art galleries? Are they not permitted to see pictures? Yes, they may, subject to the decisions of the boards of censors and the inter-commerce law. What has the inter-commerce law to do with pictures? somebody asks. "Nothing, but to stop their exhibition," is the answer of another. When was that law passed? Answer: "When the nigger beat the white man." Question: "Is that law still in effect?" Answer: "Yes." Question: "Then there is no more money in fight pictures?" Answer: "No." And yet we see that wily negro, Jack Johnson, willing to sell his interest in the pictures of his fight with Willard for $200,000. Just imagine! Enough to buy a cottage large enough for three, a cheap automobile, an outfit for a hennery, and a gasoline boat. All swapped for pictures. What are they coming to, anyway?

Somebody said to me the other day the law against fight pictures was framed to limit the heralding of the supremacy of the black race over the white. That is true in part. Let us meet the issue squarely.

The entire question hinges on the subject of motion pictures. If the white man had won in the Johnson-Jeffries fight there would be no inter-commerce state law against the transportation of fight pictures from one state to another. That law was promoted by sporting people who were "double crossed" by Johnson. They had willing supporters in the persons of the reform element. The South arose against the exhibition of a negro in supremacy and the disgruntled North coupled with them. That was the turning point for the reformers. They argued that the motion picture people were in the business only for the money. Art, they claimed, was nothing. So every picture from that day has been judged from that standard.

As an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure, why would it not be wise for the reformers to buy the negative of the Johnson-Willard fight? Willard makes no claim to the pictures. Why not buy Johnson out?

A strict watch will be kept that the same amount of stringency be maintained upon the white supremacy as it was upon the black. In their hatred of the latter the duped sportingmen made a strong ally of the reformer. The inter-commerce act is still in force.

Now, let us tell you something. There is many a member of many a censor board who likes to see "a good scrap." Now keep your eye upon the censor. Some of the fight pictures will get through. Of course, without the knowledge of the Inter-State Commerce, or the local board of censors. But they will get there. They want to see the white man. It is only a question of tabulation. You will find that the Willard-Johnson fight pictures will be exhibited in at least 30 per cent. more towns than were the Johnson-Jeffries pictures.

Here we see the fight pictures making thousands. And yet we see Billy Sunday working hard to get hundreds in Paterson, N. J. No doubt this joke has gone the rounds. "Did you see Billy?" Answer: "Yes, Sunday." Well, Billy's raid upon New York was predicted as a cold snap for the amusement places of the city. A few weeks ago we said that "Billy's" visit to New York would not hurt the box offices, notwithstanding the opinion of Mr. Joseph Brooks, the veteran theatrical manager. Mr. Sunday struck Paterson. For a training camp he struck about the best place he could find. He will have a walk-over when he reaches New York. And when he has a night off, on reaching this city, he will perhaps realize that New York City has a number of "first runs" and a large amount of work he has laid out for himself has already been accomplished by the pictures. In fifteen minutes a picture can tell a great amount of distress and point out the remedy, and all at ten cents admission. Billy Sunday can tell a lot—but if the collection falls below normal he gets provoked.

And so it is with all of these reformers. They want to do good but they want to do it gracefully. The only people who do not look for their reward in a lump are those who have built their bridges well behind them. They are the people who make the trips to Washington, Albany, and all the other law enacting points. I heard a well-living man say the other day: "By George! I could have made money. I knew Willard would win." That man never made a bet in his life. "Would you go to see the Willard-Johnson fight pictures," I asked. "I certainly would," he answered. "Why," I said, in some astonishment, "a fight is a fight." To this he replied, "Oh, yes, that may be, but the white race must hold its supremacy. I'd go and see the pictures to-morrow, and take the children, too, because it would demonstrate the power we have in the development of our race for the enlightenment of those on the lower level."

A well known cartoonist says: "Can you beat it?"

Sunday, Billy, we mean, will be much like many of the foreign actors who have reached these shores since the war started. He will be apt to say: "Why, I thought the people of this bloomin' city would be glad to meet me, but I find the bloomin' motion picture has them going."

I met a friend on Broadway a few days ago and he remarked that motion pictures had the legitimate end of the theatrical business so well tied up that there was bound to be a break. This statement interested me and I asked the reason for the prediction. My friend replied that the legitimate performers were forced to a position where they are obliged to demand recognition. "In other words," I said, "there are not enough studios to accommodate them." To this he hotly replied, "No, not that. The legitimate stage must not die. The born, the educated actor must live. The people who have built the large theatres must have them to get proper return for the money invested. Moving picture players are mere automatons. The real actor still lives. His house was not built for a screen."

And who is the "real" actor of today who has not appeared upon the screen? How did he get there? Current events show that the man who built the theatre for him was forced to succumb to the power of the motion picture. And yet my friend was right. The break has already set in. The "builders" are more cautious to-day than they were last fall. Where pictures are being shown is simply a carrying out of a policy so well known to the "tank towns" as "filling in for dark nights." The break is certainly coming. We see rising on the horizon a determined fight on the part of the "legitimate" motion picture people for recognition. It is coming slowly, but surely. Motion pictures will not be side-tracked or absorbed by the old time "legitimates." Neither will they be subserved to the interests of certain aspiring monopolies who have been using them as decoys for box office receipts. The motion picture people can to-day take the best players the legitimate stage has. Their services are on the market; but the picture people have the call on the price. New and expensive picture houses are being erected throughout the country every day. The legitimate houses are not required. Every legitimate house, manager and actor, can go back to the old regime and the picture houses would go on with the same success that attended them before the high-brows entered into the business. Because Mr. So-and-So presents, or So-and-So appears, does not make motion pictures dependent upon either. The motion picture has struggled and survived upon its own merits and despite the efforts of many people to overload the market and surfeit the public the straight motion picture house is as popular today as it was three years ago. Without attempting prophecy beyond reason I predict that before the close of the coming summer the real motion picture industry will so assert itself that the spell-binder and reap-quick investors will be so thoroughly discouraged that they will abandon the field and leave it to those who have spent years in developing and elevating it.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

"Some Bird," Swan.

SOME exhibitors are born inventive, others achieve inventiveness while the rest (and the hereinbefore mentioned) read this department and get the benefit of the discoveries. Burr Swan, of the K. P. Opera House, belongs in the first class. Mr. Swan appears to have invented the ready-printed private program. He took the heralds provided by the Paramount, bound them into his own cover with staples, ran a silk cord through and gets a 36-page and cover house program for the cost of the cover and heralds, the latter infinitely smaller than the same amount of original matter would cost to set, let alone stock and printing. Naturally he can afford to spread himself on the cover and he dolls it up with red and gold, which is the only thing we do not like. The gold looks costly, but it is not effective. At best it is almost a lemon gold, which is the pale tint, and it does not stand out as pluckily as would a plain black that would have cost less and would have looked very much better. We think that Mr. Swan probably sees this himself. His red cover stock is good both as to tint and quality, but black on red is better than red and gold if you want to have the type stand out. A deep blue, a strong brown or a good white or aluminum bronze would be worth while experimenting with, though we think that a straight ink impression would be better than any form of bronze powder. If he wants to use bronze let him try a lustrous green, blue or copper. These will stand out better. If he wants gold a redder gold would be best.

The main point is that he has something that looks a lot, really is a lot, and costs comparatively nothing in proportion to the effect.

We like, too, his envelope. He had to have that for mailing use, so he sets it to work. Instead of figuring that it would cost money to print his card on, he prints an advertisement and makes it more than pay expenses Instead of elaborately written stuff, he prints this little sum that leads over to the address:

Patchwork Girl of Oz	$2.00
The Pursuit of the Phantom	2.00
Marta of the Lowlands	2.00
The Typhoon	2.00
Where the Trail Divides	2.00
Wildflower	2.00
The County Chairman	2.00
What's His Name	2.00
Behind the Scenes	2.00
Total, at $2 a seat	$18.00
Burr Swan's price, at 10c a seat	.90

$17.10 saved for Mr.

The cover should be trimmed closer to the contents next time, the heralds should be stapled together and then bound to the cover with the silk cord and punch holes. Where the cord is omitted it is well enough to staple direct to the cover, but where cord is used a more sightly job can be done the other way. It will be easier to thread the cord if a slightly larger punch is used.

Another Daily.

Another daily paper has come along. This is the Bulletin, printed by Johnston and Peters, Tooele, Utah, for the Johnston theater. The house takes two-thirds of the first page and the rest is a riot of ads and local items. They have a lot of advertising space and some local want ads in addition to personal mention. It is a little seven by nine four pager, but we take it, it is the only daily in the town, and it looks as though it filled the well known and justly celebrated long felt want.

More from Mr. Cason.

J. N. Cason, of the Opera House, Sylacauga, Ala., sends in two more programs and a letter that says:

> You said "keep shooting," so here comes another "shot." Do you think our "aim" is improving, or is our "load" too heavy for our rifle?
> Your personal suggestion in regard to last program sent you was as greatly appreciated as it was surprising, for we certainly did not expect you to have the time to give us personal attention. Our idea for folding it the "most troublesome" way was for the benefit of the "squibs" and ads that it carried, as we thought they would more readily read if placed right along side of the day's program. However, the folding was "some" job, and we doubt if it was worth the trouble. However, we heard quite a little comment on it, as the best we'd yet produced.
> We change our design each week to more readily distinguish the separate issues, and after three or four weeks double the back and use the same style again.
> We greatly appreciate your comment and criticism, and think we have profited much thereby.
> Our opposition is grasping cheap vaudeville in an effort to keep above water, but we're still holding our own. This will, perhaps, give you a better understanding of our "dope." It's a "life and death" fight, as the town is too small for two shows, and one or the other of us must sooner or later hunt new and greener fields, but we've not yet inquired the price of crates, and expect to be forwarding you programs with the Sylacauga post mark for some time. Any improvement you might suggest in our "line of attack" or "defense" will be gratefully received.

Cheap vaudeville is a bad thing to bolster up poor business with, particularly the sort that mostly travels through the south. If the acts are good they come up north where conditions are better and the jumps are shorter. This notice from one of the recent programs is to be read in the light of that vaudeville remark.

> "HONEST TO GOODNESS"! we wouldn't exchange that program of Photo-Plays we have this week for all the other attractions that could be booked in Sylacauga. When we can offer our patrons a picture program like this (and an all-star week has gotten to be a regular event with the Universal now) we don't have to "bolster it up" with additional "pulls." We believe Sylacauga wants a PICTURE show and that's what we want to give you. We're paying the highest price for the best picture service on the market, and we believe it's worth the cost. We don't believe there's another regular picture service that can "come within a mile" of presenting an equal to this. You'll be here Monday, we know; more than likely Tuesday, too; certainly Wednesday, and if you miss either Thursday, Friday or Saturday, we don't see how you can.

Continuing their shooting simile, we would suggest that this is trying to kill a bear with buckshot. If there is to be a fight the out and out scrap commands more respect than the veiled hint. Say flatly, as Steve Farrar does, that vaudeville is played because good acts are too costly and cheap acts are worse than none at all. Do not suggest a defense. Come into the open.

The reference to folding harks back to a recent railroad folder of six sheets (twelve pages) folded over and over, a laborious process. If it was folded that way for the sake of the advertising, it was a waste of time. Even if it had helped the trade announcements, that would have been no real reason. The chief office of a program is to advertise the house. After that has been done the outside advertiser can be considered. The two fold railroad sent up is much better, though it does not give space for the outside advertising at all.

Posed With Chaplin.

J. W. Myrtle, of the Art theater, Stanton, Va., sends in a newspaper advertisement and a card with a cut showing him posing with Charles Chaplin. By the time it got over to the coarse screen half tone few would know that Mr. Myrtle was using a cut-out, probably the Hennegan Company's life-sized cut-out of the actor. The combination of a well-known local man posing with the Essanay comedian makes an attention compelling advertisement. But the advertisement loses somewhat in value when all of the copy reads "Charles Chapman" instead of "Chaplin." Most of the patrons probably knew better, but it is a slip that does not help any. The house management should seek to create the impression of expert knowledge in all things relating to plays and players and Chaplin is so well known that this little slip will be noticed by almost anyone. We hope that Mr. Myrtle told those who commented on the matter that he put it that way to see how many would notice the error.

Another Layout.

Herbert Effinger, of the Leader theater, Philadelphia, sends in a new weekly program and asks for constructive criticism. He has his own idea of a layout. It's a good one, too. The front page is merely the title. The name of the house should be reset in a more legible type. It is set in Engraver's Old English and, though in a larger point than the word "program," the latter overshadows it because it has no space lost in ascenders and descenders. The name of the house is the important line on a program front and should be set in a letter that cannot help but be read. The title is set in three lines

The Leader
Theater.

The letters are all the same point, though "theater" is not so important as "Leader" and "the" is unimportant indeed. The word program should be cut down to eighteen point with the date in twelve, then the name of the house should be played up with the first and third lines reduced. It is not necessary, but it is always better to give the name of the city. Inside the top line runs across both pages, getting practically one type page with three thirteen em columns, which helps a lot in getting machine matter set. This is the regulation newspaper column width to which machines are usually set (save where the thirteen and a half em width is used) and it is easier to get the type through if the machines need not be reset to an unusual measure. The novelty comes in giving the daily program the first and third columns with the announcements and coming attractions in the center column. The advertisement would balance better if the day were set in a smaller face, in lower case and each day were dated. This would keep them from fighting with the titles for attention. A ten point italic would be better and then the titles would stand out more prominently. It might help to have the names of the players set in italic instead of body type.

Apart from these minor suggestions there is small room for criticism. The program is informative and pleasing. The back page might be put to better use by omitting a cartoon cut and running a few paragraphs of house talk, say on the upper half with advertising for the lower half.

Plain But Good.

The Nickel Bijou, Springfield, Ill., sends in a slip of manila card 1¾ by 7¼, simply printed with the title in black type and with dated days. It is a whole week's program and it is effective because the management adheres to the simplicity of the stock and does not try to do too much. It is not impressive in appearance, but it is clean looking and effective for its price. If you cannot afford to do much, you can at least afford to do the little well. Mr. Colvin does.

A Long Time, But—

It has been a long time since the Vaudette theater, West Point, Ga., has been in with some samples, but the originator of the "one-piece coat and skirt hanger" has not been altogether asleep. Look at what he brought in this time:

CHARLES CHADLIN

THE FUNNIEST MAN IN PICTURES

VAUDETTE THEATRE
MARCH 26TH

And remember that it is all done with straight type, no fancy work of any sort and no cut, just a case of mixing up the type until you get mad and swear you'll know what it is all about.

Also remember it is good for just once.

If you want some more of the same and are willing to pay $5, get a font of twelve point Offset Litho Gothic, set a few lines in this and tell them to hold it before the mirror to read. It is an upper and lower case gothic in reverse to use in passing type over to the lithographic stone. This, too, can be used only once and the type is not much use after that, but you might club in with four or five brother managers and pass the metal along.

In the original the stock is a strip of manila card three by eleven inches. It can be folded once, caught with a cheap paper clip and sent through the mail for one cent.

Photoplay Prophets.

H. E. Rumbarger, of Elkins, W. Va., writes of a new scheme that has been found practicable in his section. He says:

> Last December when I was advertising manager for the All Star theater, of this city, I happened to be looking at the slides that were flashed on the screen one night and at the same time it was raining very hard outside. A thought came to me; why couldn't the weather forecast be made on a slide and flashed on the screen every afternoon and night? After I had thought about this for several days I finally decided to see if I could get the co-operation of Mr. Harris A. Jones, the local U. S. Weather Observer, and Assistant Observer Robinson and experiment with this idea. I soon interested these gentleman and we immediately began our experimenting. At first they tried mimmographing the slides with ink on plain glass. This did not work on account of the ink running. They next tried mimmographing on celluloid film from which the coating had been removed. This worked successfully and after some practice we were able to show a very nice slide on the screen. If plain film could be obtained, it would be an improvement, or a stencil machine to stencil the letters in black paper and place the paper between two plain slides as the celluloid films are placed, would probably be better yet. We found by inquiry that people noticed the forecast this way quicker and remembered it better than they did by seeing it in newspapers. The local Weather Bureau is now furnishing these slides to theaters in all parts of the state and as they are franked both ways, it costs the theaters absolutely nothing. It is said that all weather bureaus throughout the United States are being instructed how to make these slides, and before long this service will be available to all theaters in the different states, if they can be reached in time by mail.

We do not see why the Bureau should supply slides. This would involve a certain delay and most houses can make a scratch slide quickly. Suggestions for slide making have been given here repeatedly, most of them more practicable than stripping film. It is possible, for that matter, to get cut celluloid and by rubbing it on a board with flour emery a slight matte surface can be produced, after a few attempts, that will take slide or Higgings ink. If the slide is to be made a permanent feature it might be practicable to make a set of inserts for a brass slide. Have a sheet of brass cut the size of a slide and in this have cut three openings, the first for a permanent slip of celluloid on which is printed (by the local printer) The Weather Report. Below this a second opening would let in a celluloid slip with "for" and the day of the week. Then a series of slips could be printed for the third opening covering the usual run of weather. The day and prediction slips could be changed to meet the moment. It might be practicable for the Weather Bureau to have these slips printed up and supplied in sets to the house managers willing to use them. Their cost, in lots, would be very slight. By using a thin cover glass and a sheet of brass barely thick enough to take in the slips, binding with bits of the usual binding, a serviceable slide could be had for very slight cost, and instead of a slide being mailed every day, the usual mail or wire report could be sent in to the managers who would merely pick out the proper slip and put it in place. If Mr. Rumbarger is interested and this paragraph is not entirely clear, we'll be glad to submit a sketch.

Not So New.

Evidently William Abbott, of the Gem theater, Sandpoint, Idaho, never heard of the railroad folder style of program, for he sends in a six page, two fold railroad with this comment:

> Find copy of our weekly program for your inspection. This we feel is quite a novelty in the way of a program, as you will note it takes the place of a little booklet in appearance but is nothing more than a fold. The principal feature of this little program is that it can be put out for about half the cost of a booklet program that must be stitched and you can get it up in about half the time. I have never seen any such program commented on in the Moving Picture World.

It will probably surprise Mr. Abbott to know that this is the same thing that we have repeatedly referred to as a "railroad" program, because, like the average railroad time table, it is not stitched but opened out, sometimes to save money and sometimes to give space for a map too long to go on two facing pages.

But Mr. Abbott has not laid out his program properly. He lays it out this way: On one side, starting from the left, he has this layout:

Monday and Tuesday	Wednesday	Title Page

and on the other side is this:

Thursday	Friday and Saturday	Underline.

In folding Friday and Saturday's sheet is brought over to face Thursday and then underline is folded back on itself so that Monday and Tuesday faces Wednesday. As a result you have to look all over the thing to find out what is what. One side should be laid out this way:

Monday and Tuesday	Wednesday	Thursday

The reverse should show:

Friday and Saturday	Underline	Title

Of course in laying in the form this order is reversed. These charts show the printed page. Now have a piece of one point rule so placed that it is midway between the Monday and Tuesday page and the Wednesday page. In folding bring the Thursday page over to this rule line, so that with the first fold, the Monday and Tuesday and Friday and Saturday pages show. Now fold again and the title and underline pages are on the outside where they will show best and the days of the week are in orderly arrangement. Also some time is saved in folding.

Where an eight page is used, it is better to fold double and then in quarters. In using twelve pages fold over once and then treat as a three. The railroad form is both a time and money saver, but it should be so folded that when opened up the eye can follow naturally from page to page the days of the week.

Spread All Over.

George A. Bleich, of the Empress, Owensboro, Ky., spreads all over a recent Sunday page. He has an inch and a quarter strip clear across the top, a seven and a half inch, double column, a two inch single and a two and a quarter inch strip across five columns. This additional to a little more than two columns of reading matter. Breaking up the space in this fashion is better than a single advertisement, since it divides the announcements and gives them individuality. The long strip covers the other advertising, the double column is the "tomorrow" and the shorter strip gives the program by days, the single column advertisement announcing the solution of the Million Dollar Mystery. Breaking up the space into individual advertisements instead of boxes is a new one, and an excellent idea where there is not an excessive extra charge for composition.

In his week day advertisement he runs a boxed in "kicker" that is worth more than all the rest of the space. This is the idea:

> LISTEN TO ME!
> This Broadway Star Feature, "O'Garry of the Royal Mounted" here today' is a "crackerjack." (I hate to use that old stale expression, but nothing else aptly describes it.) This production is just fine! There's something doing in the play all the time and Edith Storey and Ned Finley play their parts to perfection.
> You can't go wrong on the show here today. You will enjoy it. —BLEICH.

Of course this must be backed by the reputation of the manager. It is not enough to say a show is good. You must be satisfied that the patron will decide that you are right, and he'll be guided by your judgment again.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

INQUIRIES.

Questions concerning photoplay writing addressed to this department will be replied to by mail if a fully addressed and stamped envelope accompanies the letter, which should be addressed to this department. Questions should be stated clearly and should be typewritten or written with pen and ink. Under no circumstances will manuscripts or synopses be criticised, whether or not a fee is sent therefor.

A list of companies will be sent if the request is made to the paper direct and not to this department, and a return stamped envelope is enclosed.

The Reason for Crepe.

FROM the Photoplay Scenario, the organ of the A. W. Thomas enterprises, we clip this paragraph. The article is titled "Ambition's Crepe Hangers," and is not signed. The opening paragraph reads:

> Why the agitation and "kick-up" by a few magazines and other periodicals of a limited circulation against so-called "scenario schools?" Why? There is surely some underlying reason commensurate with the space alotted to this subject. I do not yet feel the "weightiness" of the reason therefor, and consequently am not going to try to propound the reason nor discuss it. The environment, the scope and the field to which a periodical is limited, may influence the substance within its pages—is a good foundation for the line of its argumentation and a good bottom from which to start excursions for the discovering of a reason for its policy.

The remainder of the article is on much the same lines, a very patent plea for the schools, but Mr. Thomas or some contributor with his sanction, asks a question. We know the answer and we'll gladly tell him, though we think that he knows it himself. The agitation against the school of photoplay is this:

In nine cases out of ten; and generally the tenth, the photoplay school is conducted as a downright cheat, a lying and intentional swindle. It is obtaining money under the false pretense that something will be taught what the self-styled professor knows perfectly well cannot be taught.

More than this: it raises false hopes in the breasts of many, and it does this knowingly, willfully, intentionally and with purpose to defraud. It not only steals money from its victims but leaves them throwing good money after bad.

The photoplay school, by correspondence or otherwise, cannot teach imagination. Imagination is an inherent and God-given attribute. It can be developed by competent instruction where it exists, but it cannot be created. The schools offer no more for twenty or thirty dollars than can be had out of a good text book. Most of them do not offer that much. The self-styled professors do not know themselves and therefore cannot tell others. There are at least three schools right now that tell their pupils that from twenty to twenty-five scenes make a reel. Of what value is such teaching?

The schools are run as money making concerns. They cannot afford the time to do good work for the prices they must charge, and so they turn their pupils loose with the assurance that their education is complete when it has scarcely been begun. This is the reason that we do not like schools. This is the reason that the Photoplay Authors' League is fighting against the schools. This is the reason William Lord Wright is fighting the schools. It is a campaign against a swindle that not alone hurts the business by overcrowding it with a horde of crude novices, but hurts the chance of the novice himself by announcing graduation and not explaining that it is graduation from the Kindergarten.

And to show the calibre of the writer of the crepe article, it says:

> One of these publications sets forth as a pertinent point, the tendered suggestion that aspiring photoplaywrights study the moving pictures themselves for instruction that will lead to the successful way. Could an aspiring student of surgery accomplish a very complicated operation as a result of only watching another, and experienced, surgeon, even though he watched a hundred operations? Would he dare to attempt such an operation without first having learned and acquired a knowledge of anatomy and surgery?

Did this champion of the down-trodden ambitions never hear of the surgical clinic where pupils learn by watching the work of the masters? Did he never hear of the combination of theory, practise and demonstration?

Getting Wise.

The author who wrote about studying the films and being further at sea than ever, writes that it did him good to read the stuff and adds:

> What did more good, and what you didn't mention, was this you took the trouble to answer me with a short brisk note, beginning "Go on—you're sore—" which was perfectly true. On the receipt of that note a hat that had been several sizes too small fell over my ears and great inner good was accomplished.
> Here's another experience. I handed in a two reel comedy, and calling on the editor two weeks later was informed that it was "clever" and "give us more like that." I sallied forth strong in the conviction that now I was a regular. Shock, wasn't it, to have that same two reeler come back two or three months later with the note "unavailable." Then it was that I learned that what pleases the editor doesn't necessarily please the boss. I concluded that that same boss was a "fathead," and that he had it in for me, and what was the use of shooting good stuff at him. Then a little later I hear from him to the effect that a two reel drama I had submitted pleased him so much that would I kindly add an extra reel to provide more work for so and so, and they would make it a feature production. The conclusion I draw is that not all "good stuff" is good to all.

Probably you are much like that, and do not know it. Your stuff is turned down, though you know it is good. The editor is called names that shall not sully this fair page. He likes your stuff. He is greater than the angels.

Don't be too easily discouraged. Don't be too easily elated. Remember that kicks and kisses are equally a part of the day's work. If you get the kick eat your dinner off the mantelpiece. If you get the kiss—remember the kick and do not swell up. Take the good and bad and average up and it's pretty good after all. Realize that, and keep on going ahead. We know one woman who "gives up" about every so often. Then she changes her mind, but she takes weeks to get back to where she was, and so never makes the real progress that steady work will win.

Borrowed Wisdom.

It is not alone in photoplay textbooks that help can be found. In The Art of Public Speaking, by J. Berg Esenwein and Dale Carnagey, Dr. Esenwein says in the introduction:

> It is an ancient truism that we learn to do by doing. The first thing for the beginner in public speaking is to speak—not to study voice and gesture and the rest. Once he has spoken he can improve himself by self-observation or according to the criticisms of those who hear.

That's where so many would-be writers of photoplays go wrong. They study technique without first gaining something to which the rules of technique may be applied. First learn to plot and then, and not until then, attack the technique that will enable you to form the plots into plays.

More pregnant still is this advice on books:

> When you have not the advantage of the test of time by which to judge books, investigate as thoroughly as possible the authority of the books you read. Much that is printed and passes current is counterfeit. "I read it in a book" is to many a sufficient warranty of truth, but not to the thinker. "What book?" asks the careful mind. "What does he know about the subject and what right has he to speak on it? Who recognizes him as authority? With what other recognized authorities does he agree or disagree?"

There are "books" of four pages that sell for one dollar, and books of eight pages that sell for two dollars. If the information were of value it might be that the book would be worth the price, but most of them are adapted more or less freely from standard writings and in the adaptation the true meaning of the original author becomes lost. One genius recently sent in a typewritten "book" which is nothing more than his understanding of what has appeared in this department and in Technique of the Photoplay. He thinks it must be a good book, but he does not realize that in changing he has not only misapplied many of the suggestions but actually prints matter contradictory to the real intent of the original writer. For instance, we say that a leader is one form of insert, but a special form. He reverses this and states that insert is the same as leader, which is the case only when the insert is a leader.

In passing it might be mentioned that the Art of Public Speaking is uniform with Writing the Photoplay and other similar publications of the Home Correspondence Schools.

Getting It Over.

There is more than one way to handle any incident, and some one way is apt to be more effective than the others. Take the rather bromidic idea of a young man deterred from some evil action by the thought of his mother's advice. We will suppose that the novice starts like this:

Leader—John's mother urges him to always do what is right.

9—Front of farm house—John with carpet bag—ready to go—Mother speaks words of good advice—John promises—kisses her—takes up bag—exits.

Later on John considers his desperate situation and decides to rob the First National bank, but changes his mind. The most obvious handling of the situation would be:

Leader—Remembering his Mother's advice, John decides not to rob the bank.

46—John's room—John sits thinking—makes up his mind—takes burglar tools from table—puts in bag—about to start—changes his mind—remembers what his Mother told him—sits down.

That is no worse than some of the stuff sent in, but an author who has journeyed a little further might use a cut-in in the first example and a vision in the second, so we would get:

9—Front of farm house—John with carpet bag enters from house with Mother—she kisses him—speaks—

Cut-in—"Always do what's right, John."

Back to scene—John promises—kisses her—exits—she watches him—crying.

46—John's room—John putting burglar kit in bag—ready to start—Bill enters—shows dark lantern—tells him to come on—John about to go—stops—Fade down.

47—Fade in part of scene 9 where Mother gives advice—fade down.

Fade back to No. 46—John, greatly moved, tells Bill he is not going—Bill sore—snatches bag from John—exits alone—John sinks down, weeping.

It is a bad plan to vision and an open question as to whether the flash of scene nine will be sufficiently identifying. Then, too, if space permits, much more can be made of the incident—and space should permit since this is the important development of the story. Try it this way:

9—Living room—Mother on writing on photograph—John enters with carpet bag—looks at watch—Mother shows photo—

On screen—John's hand holding photo of mother.

Back to scene—she motions him to turn it over—he does so—looks.

On screen—Back of photo—in writing—

"Remember your mother, dear boy. Do not cause her shame."

Back to scene—John nods—kisses mother—she puts photo in frame—he slips in carpet bag—Father enters—whip in hand—time to start—John kisses Mother—exits with father, carrying bag—Mother sinks down by chair—prays.

Now we run the scenes to get John to town and then:

12—Hall room—cheaply furnished. John follows landlady in—likes room—makes payment—landlady exits—he starts to unpack—comes to photo—sinks down in chair—looks at it earnestly—kisses it—places it on bureau—he is going to keep straight for her sake.

Later on comes disappointment and desperation. Then the scene in the room.

46—Room as in No. 12—John on packing burglar's tools in bag—not the carpet bag he used before—Knock—Bill enters—All ready?—John nods—Bill looks in bag—in moving away he knocks frame from bureau—it falls to the floor—Bill picks up tricked frame—picture has fallen out—he has frame in one hand and picture in other—gives to John—John is about to replace when he sees the message—stands irresolute for a moment—shows Bill the writing on the picture—tells him he will not go—Bill sore—calls him a softy—it does not move John—angry, Bill snatches bag from John—exits—John sinks into chair looking at photograph.

It all means the same thing, but the latter form has greater dramatic value and also eliminates a leader or insert in the scene where any intrusion will lower the effect.

Got a Bonus.

This letter from Jacques Kopfstein will interest those who have seen their one-reel plots sprout into two-reel stories:

> More than a month ago at a meeting of the Inquest Club discussion arose relative to various film companies purchasing scripts of single reel length and themselves rewriting the same so as to make a two-reel photoplay. The writer brought up the fact that the Biograph Company had purchased his "Dwellers in Glass Houses" as a one-reel manuscript and had later produced a 2,000 feet photoplay therefrom.
> In justice to the Biograph Company, the writer wishes to relate his subsequent treatment after the matter had been called to their attention. To a somewhat testy letter, he was informed that the matter would be taken up with their producing department at Los Angeles. Promptly as an exchange of letters would permit, the writer received a bonus payment for the story, though he had originally been paid as much for the story as one reel as he might customarily expect for an ordinary two-reel script from many companies. I believe this established a precedent in treatment and for this reason I am calling your attention to it.

Several Things.

Anna Eckert covers a page and a half of paper with her comment, but she says things that may help others and the letter is not a line too long. Giving the history of her case she says:

> About two years ago I started off to "get rich quick" by writing scenarios. It was a soft job, I thought, as I jotted down and sent off the first batch of stories. Well—you know the result; rejection slips, of course. Like many others I began to discover that scenario writing was not so easy after all. I stopped wasting money on postage stamps and started to look through my scripts to see what was wrong with them. My! but didn't I find a lot of faults!
> It was your articles in the World that decided my course and started me on the right lines. All my spare time since that long ago has been spent in plotting and studying pictures. I go as often as possible to the picture-shows and STUDY the pictures. I try to find out what there is in a story to make it acceptable. The World has given me a great many pointers on that. When a comedy, I find out what is in it to make people laugh; or what brings the tears to the eyes when it is a heart-interest story. Occasionally, I send out a "best effort" just to see what results I get and I have the satisfaction of having my scripts held for consideration even though they are rejected. Rejection slips do not worry me any and only make me work harder to reach the goal.

She gains two points by this course. She is not only saving stamps against the time she can use them to advantage, but she does not interrupt her studies by worrying about the scripts that are overlong or back far too quickly. She can attend to study without distraction, and the time will come when her careful study of effects will stand her in good stead. In a recent Green Book George M. Cohan said that actors should write the best plays because they knew how written dialogue affected the audience. In the same way a knowledge of how effects are to be obtained will enable the writer to gain practically those same effects in other stories. But Miss Eckert writes:

> Recently, you had an article on "busts" in the World. Now, I know what a "bust" means but I am afraid to use it in my scripts for fear I might not put it down right. I do not want my work to show that I am still an amateur as did that writer when he had his characters "flash" about the room.

Evidently she is working without a text book, since all good books explain and demonstrate the bust. But her chief trouble is the synopsis, it seems, for she writes:

> One thing that troubles me is the synopsis. To make it brief and yet interesting enough to catch the editor's attention is to me the hardest part of photoplay-writing. The rest is easier for me, for I seem to have the gift of visualizing my stories. I can see everything so plainly in my mind's eye that all I have to do is to write it down in a clear and concise way. To improve on writing the synopsis, I read the synopsis of every story released, several times each week and with plenty of practice I hope to overcome this difficulty. Every day I learn something I did not know yesterday and I hope I may never come to that stage when I think I know everything and thus let my brain grow stagnant.

We think that probably she tries to tell too much. This is fatal. Don't tell the entire story but give the main points smartly. Not an hour ago we laid down a synopsis. We read it three times and then had to read the full script to see what the story was about. The synopsis was more or less a record of the events, but it was not cleverly told. It did not interest, and it did not keep the actions distinct. The synopsis should be something more than a mere hash of words.

Too Proud.

Here's another of those "human document" letters by which we may learn from the experience of others. This author writes:

> I write, not to ask for advice or help, but to let the aspiring photoplaywrights know what a chap who has not sold a script since he started, two years ago, thinks of the game. Please do not think that I wish any undue notoriety by the facts that I give you. I tell them, so, if this letter is printed, it will let the knockers who haven't sold a script in their first ten attempts know my attitude.
> Two years ago I wrote my first photoplay in half a day and sent it off. When it was returned I decided never to send another script to their studio and softly murmured the words of the immortal, or immoral, Nero, "What a genius they lost in me." I have changed since then.
> Fortunately I chanced on your department in the "World." It set me to thinking, and I purchased one of your "Techniques" and studied it at night for several months before I sent out another script. Since then I have sent out but twelve but have written over fifty.
> I have had several chances to receive advice from successful writers, but have always declined. Now, this is not false pride, but when the time comes when I am successful and can look the world in the face and tell it to go to hell, it will be through my own efforts and not those of someone greater than I.
> As I am only nineteen years old, I do not expect success for at least two or three more years, but turning my face to the future I work with an added vim for my work is not wasted.

The general tone of this letter is good. The writer seems to realize that at nineteen his views and experiences of life are not sufficiently mature to be interesting to others, but he is grounding himself by practice and study now against the time when he will have arrived at a greater knowledge.

He is foolish, however, to say that he wants no help and declines it from others, when offered. It's all very well to want to be independent of all help, but if he wants to shingle the roof we'll bet he gets a ladder and does not wait until he grows tall enough to reach without standing on tiptoe. Those who have arrived have been helped to success by those who have gone before them, and in turn they help others up, passing along their debt as they pay it.

This does not mean that any author is required to give assistance to any and all applicants. It does mean that under proper circumstances they feel it an obligation to pass help along, the bigger the man the more ready he is to help, because the less he has to fear from opposition.

No one is interested in the grafting boob who writes, "I am a total stranger to you, but I want to learn how to write, please tell me." That is one thing, but writers are glad to help, to give advice and talk shop to those who prove themselves deserving, and to refuse all aid is to woefully prolong the period of apprenticeship for the empty satisfaction of feeling that you are self made.

Why Not?

Here it comes again. A man writes that he notices that a company wants only scripts that have not been submitted elsewhere and asks if this is fair. Why not? We take it that the correspondent has the right to tell his dairyman that he wants only fresh eggs. It is "fair" for the Selig Company to make the rules, since they are the buyers, and the sole losers if the scheme does not work. It is for the seller to abide by whatever rule may be made. Selig is buying so little, just now, that it does not pay to send anything in.

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT IS AN established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until the excellence of such articles have been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two or three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending four cents, stamps, (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department, one dollar.

Both the first and second set of questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form, the second half being seventy-six in number. Either booklet may be had by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor, or both for 40 cents. Cannot use Canadian stamps. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy of these questions. You may be surprised at the number you cannot answer without study.

Question No. 81.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Could you use a 40 ampere, 220 v. fixed rheostat to get 40 amperes from a 220 volt supply? Could you use 110 volt rheostats on 500 volt supply? How much resistance is there in a 25 ampere, 110 volt rheostat? How do you figure it?

Roll of Honor on Question No. 75.

Question 75 was answered correctly as to the co-efficient end of it by the following, though there was a very considerable diversity of opinion as to the safe working temperature: Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; M. W. Larmour, Waco, Texas; Montreal, Canada; John Solar, Watertown, New York; W. C. Crawford, Brooklyn, New York; Clarence E. Lawson, Cleveland, Tennessee, and B. M. Spencer, Attleboro, Massachusetts.

I have selected the reply of Brother Lawson for publication, checked by a letter from the Driver-Harris Wire Company, Harrison, N. J., manufacturers of resistance wires. I submitted the question to the Driver-Harris Company, asking them to kindly reply to the same, so I could have a source of unquestioned authority when it came to checking up the replies.

Reply to Question No. 75.

By C. E. Lawson, Cleveland, Tennessee.

The Question:

What is meant by a temperature co-efficient, and how would you apply it? For instance: If your rheostat at 76 degrees F., offers 2 ohms resistance, what will its resistance be when its temperature is 500, the wire being "climax," having a resistance fifty times that of copper, with a temperature co-efficient of .0004? What should be the working limit of temperature in a rheostat? At what temperature will resistance begin to show red in a dark room?

The Answer:

Most all metals increase in resistance as the temperature rises. This rise is usually based on a change in temperature from the temperature of melting ice. If the temperature is increasing, the rate of its increase in ohms per unit of increase in temperature, which is the temperature co-efficient, will be positive, and if the temperature is decreasing the co-efficient will be negative. The application of this is as follows, when the temperature is increasing. Taking the problem given, for example:

If the resistance of a rheostat at a temperature of 76 degrees F., is 2 ohms, the resistance at the base, or at a temperature of 32 degrees, the co-efficient being .0004, would be found by first subtracting from 76 degrees the base, 32 degrees, which would leave 44 degrees of increase in temperature acting to produce two ohms resistance. For each degree of increase in temperature the resistance per ohm increases .0004 ohms and for 44 degrees increase the increase per ohm would be 44 times .0004, which equals .0176 ohms, and for the production of 2 ohms, as given in the problem, the base would have been equal to 2 ohms divided by (1 ohm plus the increase caused by temperature, or 1 + .0176), 1.0176, which equals 1.96541 ohms. Now having gotten the base resistance of the rheostat, if we increase the temperature to 500 degrees, an increase of 468 degrees over the standard, we must multiply the resistance at the standard temperature by the co-efficient .0004 for each rise of 1 degree, and for 468 degrees we would be obliged to multiply by 468. Then if the base resistance, as found above, is 1.96541, the rise for 1 degree would be .0004 times 1.96541, which is .000786164, and for an increase of 468 degrees, 468 times .000786164, which is .367924752 ohms, and this value added to the base, 1.96541, gives 2.333334752 ohms resistance at 500 degrees, or, disregarding the last five figures of the decimal, we have 2.3333 ohms.

The working limit of temperature in a rheostat would be such a temperature as was found when the heat radiated ceased to be greater than the heat generated, for if it were carried further than this there would be an increase in heat sufficient to eventually melt and ruin the rheostat.

The temperature at which resistance will begin to show red in a dark room will depend on the metal used in the construction of the rheostat, as some metals get red at a less temperature than others.

The Driver-Harris Wire Company reply as follows:

> We have your letter of March 20th, and would submit the following as answer to question 75: Temperature co-efficient is the rate of increase of resistance with increase of temperature. In the problem given the increase of temperature is 424 degrees. As the temperature co-efficient is .0004 per degree F., the total increase is $.0004 \times 424 = .1696$, and the resistance of the two ohm coil of climax at 500 degrees F., would be $2 + 2 \times .1696 = 2.3392$ ohms.
> The working limit of temperature in a rheostat is generally taken at just under a red heat, or about 900 degrees F., although the underwriters do not permit as high a temperature rise as this. The coils will show red in the dark at about 900 degrees F., or a trifle above.

We are obliged to the Driver-Harris Wire Company for their courtesy. They are, of course, an unquestioned authority in matters of this kind.

I cannot quite agree with Friend Lawson as to his reply on the maximum temperature. I think that what he really meant was all right, but when he says "heat radiated ceased to be greater than the heat generated," why, he is wrong, because that condition is never present. If the heat radiated was greater than the heat generated, why the coils could get cold instead of warm. I believe Brother Lawson side-stepped on that part of the question just a little, but he is, nevertheless, very complete in the main part of the answer.

The Strand.

There is no one who has greater or more abiding admiration for the work accomplished by Mr. S. L. Rothapfel, manager of the Strand theater, New York City, than myself. I have looked at effects in staging moving pictures in the Strand which were little short of marvelous in their beauty. Mr. Rothapfel is, beyond any question, past master of the art of staging the moving picture and accompanying it with music. So far as I know, no one, up to date, has even approached him in these highly important matters; also his operators have only to suggest the need of more improved appliance to get it. All these things are good, yet, ever since the Strand opened I have had my war club unslung and my scalping knife whetted on one proposition, viz.: the speed at which its pictures were projected.

A couple of weeks ago, however, I went up and had a long talk with Mr. Rothapfel and, as a result, have laid the war club away and dulled the edge of the knife; this by reason of the fact that Brother Rothapfel swears by all that is good and holy that the few times I visited the Strand it so happened that things were not quite what they should have been just at that particular time, and I am willing to believe that statement.

Certainly the projection I looked at in the Strand since then has been all that could be desired, except that, to my mind, the pictures are at all times run a little faster than they should be, but both Mr. Rothapfel and his chief operator, Lester Bowen, disagree with me in this, making the claim that if they are run at normal speed there is not that "snap" there should be. I am somewhat inclined to question this part of it, however, to some extent, and attribute the real cause mostly to the following: The Strand is using 75 amperes D. C., projecting an exceedingly brilliant picture on a gold fibre screen, and I think the real reason for the extra speed (averaging probably 63 to 65) lies perhaps to some extent in that given by Mr. Rothapfel, but most largely to the fact that with the two-wing shutter used it would be impossible to project at normal speed without some flicker.

At any rate the speed recently viewed is not seriously objectionable, and I am willing to concede that on the whole perhaps the effect is better than would be had at normal speed and decreased amperage, therefore, taking all these things into consideration, I think I must concede the point.

The Strand is a magnificent theater. It is the pride of New York filmdom, therefore it is a very real pleasure to me to be able to say these things.

The projection is in charge of Lester Bowen, chief operator, assisted by Frank Hammond, Jack Kelly, and Walter Pitchard. The operating room is equipped with the most up-to-date appliances, including ammeters, and the automatic arc regulators described in this department some time ago. Mr. Bowen speaks highly of these regulators. The operating room force is entitled to a great deal of credit. The work at the Strand is difficult. Mr. Rothapfel tells me there are times when the show will contain a very great number of cues, not one of which has ever been missed by a Strand operator. The work in the Strand operating room is high tension and mistakes must not occur. The Strand pays its operators well. It expects results in return, and it—gets them.

From Brother Cheney.

J. R. Cheney, El Centro, California, answers Brother Day as follows:

> Well, Friend Day, you did not quite understand my meaning. I did not say there were too many real operators, nor do I object to educating more. That is one thing I do like to see—plenty of good men. What I want is men with practical experience—not kids who have read books and papers then go out and try to get a job. In the first place they have not the confidence or nerve to ask a living wage. I would not care if fifty per cent. of the population of the United States were operators, so long as they got the money. I don't care if you read all the books printed on projection, unless you have not had some real, practical experience it won't make you an operator. As for being an old-timer, I have been in the business seven and a half years. Now, look here Brother Day, I bet you don't even carry a union card. (You have got another bet coming on that. Ed.) I believe in having a man serve an apprenticeship under a competent operator, and, if possible, a union man, so that when he goes out for himself he will have confidence in himself, and be able to demand real money.

Brother Cheney, I am printing your letter, but that is the last of this particular matter. I am printing it simply because it brings out a point. I heartily and thoroughly agree with every word you say, but you might just exactly as well attempt to stop the waves of the Atlantic Ocean as to prevent the publication of projection departments and books of instruction. It cannot be done, it never has been done, and it never will be done, and that brings us to the point. Would you not rather have the projection department in the hands of a man who favors the union in every right way, and does all he can to aid and assist it, and have the Handbook put out by a man who will not make it into a kindergarten course, but into a high-class book of instruction, rather than have the department in the hands of a man who would oppose the union, or the Handbook put out by an individual who cared absolutely nothing for anything but to "get the money"? You had better stop and think that matter over, Friend Cheney. But first let me repeat the statement, that every man ought to understand by this time, viz.: you cannot suppress, or even limit the dissemination of knowledge on operating, or any other subject under the sun. It is a fact, of course, that the beginner can, to a certain extent, take advantage of the things contained in books and papers, but how utterly useless and idiotic it would be to say on that account books and papers ought to be suppressed. What would you think of an architect who would demand that all works in architectural drawing be suppressed for fear that some beginner might learn his profession? Would you say the man was just crazy, or a blanked fool? I guess probably you would say both.

Longest Throw.

Arthur Kent Watson, Orange, Texas, writes:

> Kindly advise me what is the longest throw—distance from lens to screen—so far as you know. We have an extremely long throw here in Orange, and would like to know just where we stand. How long is the much famed one in England? And if there is one longer, where is it?

Frankly, Neighbor Watson, I don't know. I suppose I have heard, but it did not linger in my memory. I would like to hear from others with regard to this, and would ask our English and French brothers to tell us what they know of long throws, if they will extend that courtesy. The longest I remember now is The Million Dollar Pier, Atlantic City, N. J., which is approximately 215 feet. In telling of long throws give details of lens combinations if possible.

Rochester, N. Y., Examination.

An examination for licensing moving picture operators was held in Rochester in the first part of March. There were considerably in excess of thirty applicants. Examination consisted of practical and theoretical work, the practical work to be illustrated. Examining board consists of the commissioner of public safety, fire marshal and superintendent of fire and police telegraph.

It is to smile! By what stretch of the imagination can these gentlemen be supposed to be particularly well posted on practical projection. Might not one as well expect the railroads to have their locomotive engineers examined by an examining board consisting of the superintendent of street cleaning, the head of the public service commission, and the chief of police? The examination of operators is a good thing PROVIDED THE EXAMINATION BE CONDUCTED BY A BOARD WHICH IS CAPABLE OF MAKING AN EXAMINATION. IN OTHER WORDS, BY A BOARD CONTAINING AT LEAST ONE MAN THOROUGHLY VERSED IN PRACTICAL PROJECTION.

Old.

Fred Simmons, Kingston, Canada, says:

> We just changed to A. C. and got a few surprises, one of which was that the arc kept flying around the carbon; but we doped out a scheme which stopped it, viz., filing a V-shaped slot in front of the carbons; also cut out rheostat and put in a choke coil. Now we don't use any more current than we did with D. C. and get equal results.

The V-slot-in-carbons stunt is old. At one time there was a carbon of that kind manufactured. It is, however, not necessary if you use cored carbons and set them right. As to the choke coil, the reason you get equal results with the same wattage input is that you cut a lot of the waste due to resistance, and, while you only take the same wattage from the line, you are getting probably double the amperage at the arc.

Enjoys the "Comic Section."

R. E. Sivley, San Antonio, Texas, referring to February 20 issue, says:

> I have exactly the same number of degrees as has your friend Mr. T. E. Anderson, of St. Paul, but not from a correspondence school, praise be. I enjoy the "comic section" as much as does Mr. Byron, of Chicago, but occasionally I learn something or run across some new stunt in the department. By "occasionally" I mean every Wednesday morning when I get my copy from the newsdealer. I am interested in the solution of the "Queer Proposition." The Standard people say the trouble was brought about by the A. C. field, and that it may be overcome by removing the D. C. conduit from this field. Well—maybe so, but I cannot see it. If there is enough field to materially effect an entirely independent circuit three or four inches away, your conduit which contains the A. C. circuit will be some hot. Anyhow the reason for putting both wires of the A C circuit in the same conduit is to neutralize the magnetic fields and thus prevent a difference of potential between different parts of the same conduit and avoid heating the conduit From what I can gather the "why" of this thing lies not in the proximity of the two circuits, but in the machine not being properly grounded. Since the editor is quite sure the trouble was not due to carbon setting, I think very likely that one of the carbon holders was not perfectly insulated, and that, in turn, the whole machine was not insulated from everything else when Barron thought it was. So far as being the result of the A. C. magnetic field "it simply cannot was." Suppose you ask the Standard people to go a little more into details concerning the e. f. of the magnetic field which they found. I for one will be more than glad to get all the data available on this particular effect, and am sure there are mny others who will be interested.

Confound the luck! I wish I had time to go into this matter myself and dope it out right. I am not an electrical engineer, but I'll bet forty dollars if I had time to go after it I would get the thing right. But I cannot—not now, therefore I am referring your letter to the Standard people. When I come to think of the matter it strikes me you are pretty near right. Since all this has developed I have often regretted that I did not take the time while I was up there to examine that installation thoroughly, and make some actual tests. Brother Sivley is absolutely correct in one respect at least. The National Code demands that (Page 49, Clause P of section 26) two or more wires of an alternating current system be placed in the same conduit. This is, as Friend Sivley says, to avoid inductive effects by neutralizing the field. We will wait until we hear from the standard folks before going further into this matter.

For the Whole Bunch.

Erie, Pennsylvania, says:

> Seeing a lack of enthusiasm in Erie I grasp my quill to speak for the whole bunch. We are all members of the I. A., Local 351, which has been going for nearly a year. President, R. C. Beyers; vice-president, Phil Casper; secretary, Stephen Karkula; treasurer, H. R. Wellington; business agent, Frank Krause; guard, Dean Smith. In February 13 issue of the World you speak of Brother Day as holding the record for finding the largest number of "bum" patches in a single reel, but I guess I can go him a couple better. Enclosed find fifty-one patches I amputated from a one-reel Edison. Of course we are running ancient stuff, but I thought they looked them over at the exchange. Tell Brother Day I am so sorry to take his amputation record, but the "Lone Star" is a long way from the "Keystone," therefore I guess I am safe from his wrath. I have nothing but praise for the M. P. World in general, and the projection department in particular. It is the best in the country. If you ever voyage over the hills to our metropolis on that deep-sea-go-devil of yours, don't forget to call on the units of 351.

Yes, my brother, the exchanges are "supposed" to look over the reels, but some of them, I am sorry to say, merely uncover the boxes when they come back from the last show and look over the reel, as it lies in the box, at the records to see where it is to be shipped out to. As to the amputation record, well, you and Friend Day for that.

Improved.

Recently I published a letter severely criticising the speed at which films were run in most of the houses in Providence, Rhode Island. Now comes the following from that city:

> Some time ago it was reported to you that some of the theaters here were shooting the film through at terrific speed. This seems to be the case in every instance where the house is after the stray pennies. Your answer with regard to correct speed at which to project must have pricked the conscience of many offenders. I won't say it had direct effect on projection here, or that it didn't, but evidently the handwriting on the wall has been observed, for the picture is now being projected instead of shot, in at least one instance. There was one house mentioned in particular, the Casino; since then this house has changed ownership, and the projection is all that a fair-minded critic could wish for, a distinct effort being made to project at the same speed at which the picture was taken; therefore, evidently the picture is the first consideration and not the stray pennies.

I am glad to hear that even one house has reformed and ceased the practice of committing an outrage on the public and the moving picture business in general, for that is what speeding the projection machine amounts to. The very poorest way to get even the stray pennies is by the poor projection route.

An Interested Reader.

Albert H. Estes, Orangeburg, South Carolina, a member of Local 347, I. A. T. S. E., Columbia, S. C., is an interested reader of the Moving Picture World, as is evidenced made apparent and proven by the accompanying very excellent likeness, or image of the aforesaid operator. Just what page he has the publication opened at, deponent sayeth not, but will bet dollars to a hard baked doughnut he is reading—Oh, well, why hurt Epes Winthrop's feelings? He has an ingrowing idea that nobody reads anything but his jun— masterpieces, but we know better—dern him!

By the way, some of those shadows-on-the-screen - don't-know-nuttin'-'bout-no-projecshun - department - or - handbook Artists might rubber at the picture and then take much benefit to themselves by emulating the shining example of Brother Estes.

He Disagrees.

C. E. McKay, Hannibal, Missouri, says:

> Dissension being one of the principal ingredients of my make-up, I am going to ease my mind with the following: At various times I have noted your statement that when making the adjustments necessary to maintain perfect illumination you say the operator should keep his eyes glued to the screen and derive his knowledge of needed adjustments of the light from what he sees there. With this I cannot agree. My contention is that if the operator maintains his light solely by what he sees on the screen there would, of necessity, as you must admit, be discoloration before adjustment was necessary, or, rather, before the operator knew that adjustment was necessary, and this discoloration, which would appear gradually, would have to become very pronounced before it would be noticeable. My own idea is that with an occasional glance at the spot the field can be kept absolutely clear at all times. Should I be incorrect in this matter you have my full consent to sit down on me as hard as you may deem necessary. I am projecting an 18-foot picture at 67 feet with a motor-driven Simplex machine. Current is taken through a G. E. mercury arc rectifier and the operating room ammeter usually registers between 45 and 50 amperes. Carbons, 5/8 inch top and bottom. House seats a little over 1,200, and, with standing room, will easily go to 1,300. We have packed houses, with, as a rule, a lobby full waiting. Being of an unobtrusive and retiring disposition I won't say anything about the quality of the projection, except that I have never seen any better. Your education of the operator through the department has my hearty endorsement, especially as to the questions and answers. I have found my knowledge of armature winding and generators and motors, which I studied before I took up operating, to be a vast help to me. Have been reading the department for about five years; always enjoy it thoroughly.

G-r-r-r-r! Man it is dangerous to disagree with me. G-r-r-r-r! I am liable to bite. Theoretically you are perfectly right with regard to looking at the spot; practically I disagree. I will venture the assertion that after I got back into practice again I could maintain an absolutely clear sheet simply by looking at the picture. Yes, I can do precisely the same thing by looking at the spot and screen both, I grant you that, but if you have a dark operating room, as you should have, looking at the spot is mighty injurious to the eyes and will seriously injure, if not ruin, your sight in course of time. You must understand, Brother McKay, and I think you do understand, and every other operator understands, that where a man remains right at the machine and does nothing but project his picture, the adjustment of the arc becomes almost an automatic operation. He knows when the arc needs adjustment almost without looking at the screen or anything else—remember I am talking of the man who watches his picture continuously and delivers high class work. The only thing I have against the spot idea is that (a) it is exceedingly hard on the eyes, and if the colored glass protector is used it is rather hard to gauge the light at the spot with accuracy, particularly with A. C.; (b) I have always contended, and I think will always continue to argue, that when the picture is running, the operator's eyes should be on the screen, not occasionally, but every instant of the time. I am sorry, indeed, that your modesty forbids your telling us what really splendid projection you have. But, at that, seriously, old man, I venture the assertion that you are delivering good results. I think, however, you would find an improvement in using a 3/4-inch cored carbon above and a 5/8-inch solid or cored below.

The Wrong Stand.

Arthur Ayers, Bellefontaine, Ohio, in submitting answer to question 69, remarks:

> Brother Cheney is taking the wrong stand if he wishes knowledge of projection suppressed, as I understand from his letter he does. Also Mr. Leininger is, I believe, wrong. I am of the opinion that every operator ought to understand electrical action, and everything he can learn about the things pertaining thereto. It is a very interesting study, to say the least. For myself I would say, Friend Richardson, if there is anything you can do for the education of the operator do it, and I am sure all really high class men are with you, whether they come out in the open and say so or not.

No, I do not think Brother Cheney exactly meant that he wanted knowledge suppressed. He, like many others, would like to have all the knowledge it is possible to get, but would like to have that knowledge limited to operators—that is to say, not made available to anyone else. That is a fine theory, all right; the only trouble is it's not practical—it cannot be did.

Managers Should Read This.

George Eberwine, manager Auditorium Theater, Marblehead, Ohio, writes:

> Enclosed find $3 for one year's subscription to the M. P. World to be mailed to my chief operator, William Schmidt, Marblehead, Ohio. Also I want you to send him the back issues of 1915, dating his subscription to begin with February 6 issue. It is absolutely necessary for an operator to read the projection department of the M. P. World and have the Handbook, which I also always furnish to my operators. Success for the exhibitor depends largely on the man in the operating room, as well as on film service. I have been a reader of the World for five years. Possibly, Mr. Richardson, you may remember I sent an article two years ago on how to avoid condenser breakage by cutting into the lens holder about half way up with a hacksaw on each end, making three or four cuts to allow for expansion. We have not cracked or broken a lens in either of our Edison machines since that time, while before we used to break 'em by the dozen.

Yes, I remember publishing that stunt, and it is a good one too, where the old-style, heavy, round condenser mount is used, but none of the modern projectors have mounts of that kind. I would direct managers' attention to the fact that Neighbor Eberwine furnishes the department and the Handbook to his operators. This is a mighty wise thing to do. Don't you— can't you fellows understand that while it is true I receive a royalty on the Handbook, still, at the same time, I am not pushing its sale altogether from a financial point of view? In fact, strange and unbelievable as it may seem to you, the financial end of it is the least consideration with me. I want that book in the moving picture operator's hands because it ought to be there, and I would rather see one copy of it sold to a bona fide moving picture operator than six copies sold to anyone else. Now you can believe that or not believe it, just as you please, but it is a fact just the same. If managers would all take the same action Friend Eberwine takes with regard to the Handbook and the projection department, and not only furnish these things but see to it that their operators study them, it would be one of the best investments they ever made in all their managerial life.

Teaching.

Allan F. Sparrow, Springfield, Vermont, writes:

> I have been some interested in the bellowings concerning your attempt to teach operators something about better projection. Particularly it is to smile when one man remarks about printers not being taugh by mail, or otherwise. For his information let me say that the Typographical Union itself fathers a correspondence school for that very purpose—not for beginners, but that journeymen printers may become better workmen, and thus worthy of more pay, which they get. Also there are numerous schools for the linotype—some to printers only, which increases a man's chances for work at better pay, and others taking on anyone, which is a drag on the craft as a whole, though, at that, men of that class do not amount to much. One must know the rudiments, and even more, before correspondence courses cuts much figure. (This is an absolute fact.—Ed.) But in the case of men actually working at a trade, hints from those who have had the time and opportunity to dig more deeply into the subject cannot fail to be a great benefit. The Handbook and the projection department have been, and are, helping us to better projection, and we are getting a reputation in northern New England for the excellence of our pictures. We have two Six A motor driven machines in the Ideal, and with 20 to 40 day services are giving better projection than I have seen in most of the city theaters. Our one defect comes from the use of a.c., but I intend to remove this by putting in a rotary converter. In closing let me ask if 3/4 carbons would be better than 5/8 when using 54 or 65 amperes a.c.?

My answer to your question would be, get a bundle of 3/4 carbons and try them. I doubt the improvement. I believe you will return to the 5/8. As to dispensing with the use of a.c., I would by all means advise it. As to the bellowings, why the wise man does not waste breath that way; he gets busy and studies; the opinion of the unwise man does not count for very much.

Those Experiments.

At last those long promised experiments are beginning to become an actuality. Brother Griffiths has come down from Ansonia and is working like a beaver, getting things into final shape to start something, and right here let me give due credit where credit belongs.

I wrote the General Electric Company, asking if they had a second-hand 50 ampere mercury arc rectifier they could loan us for the purpose of these experiments. By return mail came a letter saying they were preparing to ship me a new 50 ampere rectifier. It arrived in due time, and is a beauty. It will perhaps be remembered that some two months ago I made a recommendation to the General Electric Company, through the department, that they ought to install a butterfly switch, so that the amperage of their rectifier could be changed without changing the connections—merely by moving the switch; also there should be an arrangement made whereby, in case a tube played out the operator could instantly switch over to the reactance, and, using that as an economizer, instantly proceed with the show on A. C. To show something of the influence of the department, the General Electric Company wrote that, following the publication of my recommendation, they received over one thousand inquiries a week concerning the same, and informing me they would immediately be made. They have been made, and in most excellent form, too. The rectifier sent me is the first one so equipped. The butterfly switch is on the front of the panel, so that the operator can instantly change his current strength, and, there are eleven contacts, providing that many possible current variations. The triple pole, double-throw switch is also on the front of the panel and if the tube breaks or goes dead the operator can switch over to A. C. in less than a second, and proceed with the show with alternating current at the arc.

The Nicholas Power Company made, for the purpose of these experiments, as good an optical bench as was ever constructed. Metal throughout, six feet long, graduated in eighths of an inch, and with an arrangement to hold the lenses so they can be spaced in any desired way, also moved up and down, or sidewise with relation to each other.

The Precision Machine Company let us have one of their latest improved lamps and lamphouse.

The thanks of the Editor of the Department are also due and herewith tendered to many other manufacturers who heartily offered to share a part of the expense. The additional financial cost, however, will be borne by the Moving Picture World.

I hope within two weeks to begin to publish some very interesting matter. Just how long the experiments will last remains to be seen; possibly two weeks; possibly two months. But I really believe we can settle the whole matter in two weeks, though I formerly expected it to last at least sixty days.

LATER—At last those much-talked-of experiments are actually under way, and even at this writing, when only a few preliminary tests have been made, I have seen things which have, in my mind, at least, upset all the pre-conceived notions concerning the optical action of the projection optical system. And right here let me say that Brother Griffith and Brother Armstrong, of Ansonia, Conn., and Superior, Wisconsin, respectively, are the only two who have demonstrated to the Department that they have any understanding whatever of the real action of the projector optical system, therefore, to them belongs much credit.

Long ago the editor declared himself against the universally accepted theory that the light rays from the condenser meet and cross at a pinpoint in the center of the objective. That was five years ago. The meet-and-cross-in-the-middle was then accepted by literally every one as the fact. To the editor it did not spell common sense, and, as said, he declared against it. Few, if any, agreed with him at that time, and many even scoffed and said: "Richardson has a nerve to set his opinion up against that of every one else, even the lens manufacturers." But we held to our views and invited dissenters to prove us wrong. None did so, and gradually, through discussion in the department, and experiments made by operators, a belief grew that Richardson was not exactly crazy after all; in fact of late it has been very universally doubted that the rays cross in the objective.

Recently, however, Brother Armstrong, Superior, Wisconsin, sent in a long article, illustrated by more than a dozen splendid tracings on oiled silk, which set up an entirely new theory. Just about the same time, Brother Griffiths, Ansonia, Conn., sent in an article setting forth precisely the same general idea, though arrived at in a different way.

These articles were not published because of the fact that the experiments only waited electrical connections to begin.

At last the connections were made, and everything in readiness, and I sent for Brother Griffiths who arrived on the scene Sunday, March 21, and on Monday we proceeded to get busy. The plant consists of a 50 ampere G. E. Mercury arc rectifier, with butterfly switch to instantly vary amperage at will, and another switch to throw over to A. C. instantly a D. C. ammeter, an A. C. ammeter, a D. C. volt meter, an A. C. volt meter, a Simplex lamphouse and a late model lamp, a specially designed smoke box, a splendid optical bench, twenty-two objectives of different local lengths and condensing lenses, both plano, bi-convex and meniscus, of all the focal lengths used, so far as we could obtain them.

The very first experiment made showed how very much we had been guessing at things, and the next one nearly knocked the editor off the Christmas tree. But I'll start at the beginning and tell you all about it, decently and in order, as soon as things have been finally finished and thoroughly tested out, which may be anywhere from two weeks to a month from now. The results of these experiments will, I think, be revolutionized in some ways—and I must have time to prove things, and make certain we are right before publication.

Schneider Claims Patent.

Eberhard Schneider, New York City, informs us that the device in the projection department, page 1285, February 27 issue, is patented, the patent being No. 1006292, October 17, 1911, and the property of Mr. Schneider.

This department does not care to enter into patent arguments. However, granting Friend Schneider's claim as to his patent, the fact remains, unless I am badly mistaken, he used a prism for reflection, whereas Stone and Suckno use a mirror. This is a slight difference, true, but don't let the fact escape your memory that there are, up to date, almost fifty patents on the humble wash-board corrugation. That is to say, the United States Government has solemnly agreed that fully fifty inventors are entitled to a patent on the corrugations of wash-boards. This being a fact, and, ridiculous as it seems, it is a fact, there might possibly be room for argument as to whether a mirror and the critical-angle prism-reflection proposition constitutes a difference sufficient to give both inventors standing in the courts. I don't know much about these things, but I do know, or at least firmly believe, that the United States Patent Office is one of the rankest hot-air machines and bluffs our good friend Uncle Samuel owns.

On the War Path.

F. B. Payne, Adrian, Michigan, is on the war path against a certain film producing company to whom I have referred his letter. He says in part:

> It has been a long time since I butted in on the happy family, but I have a kick coming. A certain make of film is so dark, photographically, that you cannot get a decent light with less than a million amperes, and some of them dance on the screen fearfully. I had one today that for dancing would make Gertrude Hoffman look like a steam shovel, Believe me, it was awful. What was the cause? Imperfect perforations, or—what? I am in a small town, 10,500; three shows. But there is one thing I do want, and by gum I get it too, viz.: steady, flickerless pictures. Rather a broad statement, but nevertheless a true one. I invite inspection at any time. If a man takes pride in his screen results and delivers the goods "he should worry" who drops in, or when he drops in, except when along comes a dark, jumping, dancing film and then—Good night! Of course, so far as an audience is concerned, it is always the operator. He is either intoxicated or else don't give two whoops in hades about his work. That is the way the audience looks at that. Today I am running "Rip Van Winkle" by Thomas Jefferson. I wish some of the producers and their camera-men, perforating and dark room men were here to see it. It is as steady and smooth on the screen as six gallons of oil. It is a real pleasure to run, but when you get the other kind I claim it is exactly what Sherman said war was.

Yes. Brother Payne, and I agree with you. I am referring your letter to the producer in question, and asking him to look into the matter and see what, if anything, is wrong. It is a shame to have the work of a really conscientious operator ruined by things of this kind. The Lord knows we have few enough operators who take real pride and pains in their work, without discouraging those who do.

Side Motion.

S. H. Freeman, Urbana, Illinois, says:

> Sorry I did not explain more thoroughly in former letter. The operator cleans the intermittent sprocket each day with a tooth brush; service is three to fifteen days old; operating room is of concrete, with iron posts running down to basement, where they are embedded in the brick foundation. The picture moves from side to side four times to each turn of the crank. The picture was out of frame today and the operator just pushed on the body of the machine to get it back. Is that where the trouble is? Would you advise using ¾-inch carbons above on 40 amperes D. C.? Have a day and night screen and the light is too bright, or at least it is hard on the eyes. Would more light overhead help matters?

If the operator can push the screen over to frame the picture sidewise then that machine ought by all means to be anchored down solid. This can be done in a number of ways, one of which is illustrated on page 91 and another method on page 92 of the Handbook. If the side motion is four times to each turn of the crank, then the trouble is, in all human probability, in your intermittent sprocket. Either it has end motion (it should have absolutely none) or the sprocket itself is not true; that is to say, the teeth are not, and that hardly seems possible. Have your operator hold his finger lightly against the edge of the film as it goes into the top of the gate. If that stops the trouble set your top gate idler so it will fit the film more snugly. However, the intermittent sprocket goes around just exactly four times to each turn of the crank, therefore if the trouble occurs that often its seat is in the intermittent sprocket. As to the carbons, some operators prefer ¾-cored above when using 40 amperes D. C. If the light is too bright why not cut down the amperage? That, it seems to me, would be the sensible thing to do.

OPERATORS Are you perfectly satisfied with the results you get on the screen?

Comments on the Films

General Film Company.

THE END OF THE PLAY (Biograph), April 5.—A one-reel comedy-drama in which the love story of a playwright and an actress supplies the motif. An engaging bit of romance, which pictures the dramatist's profession in very attractive colors. Charles Perley and Augusta Anderson handle the chief incidents of the film with excellent results.

WON THROUGH MERIT (Edison), April 5.—Pat O'Malley, Gladys Hulette, John Walker, and the U. S. Civil Service Commission are featured in this one-reel photoplay, which combines a pretty love tale and interesting views of the Government buildings at Washington. An out-of-the-common film.

THE OTHER WOMAN'S PICTURE (Essanay), April 5.—Founded upon a "Smart Set" story by Mrs. John Van Vorst, this one-reel drama is an intense fragment of dramatic writing, whose power to rivet the attention cannot be withstood. Gerda Holmes, Richard C. Travers and Lester Cuneo give the film every necessary assistance.

ROAD O' STRIFE SERIES (Episode No. 1, "The House of Secrets" Series) (Lubin), April 5.—This new series of mystery stories which introduces Crane Wilbur as one of the Lubin forces, opens in an interesting manner and promises well for the future. The new Lubin method of flashing a sub-title directly onto the scene that it explains, is used in this picture. Mary Charleson and Bernard Siegel are Mr. Wilbur's leading support.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL NO. 27, 1915 (Selig), April 5.—President Wilson's visit to the battleship Moreno, of the Argentine Navy; shipping cavalry horses at Newport News; trial trip of L-1, new type of submarine, at Quincy, Mass.; the rescued crew of the "Denver"; Wilson and Taft laying cornerstone of Red Cross building at Washington, and timely war pictures from Russian Poland are the leading news topics of this number.

MR. JARR TAKES A NIGHT OFF (The Jarr Family Series, No. 4) (Vitagraph), April 5.—"Mr. Jarr Among the Freaks" would also be an appropriate title for this instalment. At any rate, he gets mixed up with a large and varied collection of sideshow stars, experiences a lurid evening in their company and all land in a police court. Good fun for the on-looker. Harry Davenport and his old associates are still at work.

A CLEAN SWEEP (Edison), April 6.—Pieces of stove-pipe, soot, a stove, a chimney-sweep, Artie, Waddy, and a bathtub filled with water get mixed up in a most amusing manner during the progress of this one-reel farce. Jessie Stevens and Gladys Leslie, also have both hands in the comedy dough.

"HAM'S" HARROWING DUEL (Kalem), April 6.—Fifteen minutes of capital burlesque, thanks to the spirited playing of "Ham," "Bud," Marin Sais and Charles Inslee. Their amusing antics make this one-reel film a welcome release. One of the best of the series.

CAPTURING THE COOK (Lubin), April 6.—Joseph Kaufman and Ethel Clayton have scored again with a rattling good one-reel farce, which they handle with their accustomed skill. "Capturing the Cook" will capture a large number of laughs.

GETTING A START IN LIFE (Selig), April 6.—A James Curwood comedy and an exceptionally breezy one. Expansive fun runs riot through the reel, and the efforts of the Westerners to win the lady from the East, after stocking her home for her, is in the right comedy vein. Tom Mix heads the cow-punchers.

SNAP SHOTS (Edison), April 7.—A fairly amusing comedy, thanks mainly to the comic gifts of Herbert Prior. Andy Clark as "The Angel Child" also counts heavily in the laugh-getting.

AUNT MARY (Selig), April 7.—A one-reel drama, with a domestic atmosphere that will add to its appeal. The story is along the usual lines, and is helped materially by the good acting of the entire cast.

STAGE MONEY (Vitagraph), April 7.—The one way to enjoy "Stage Money" is to take it all on faith. To attempt to square most of its incidents with the rule of probability would be a waste of time, but as one reel of irresponsible but diverting nonsense, it fulfills its mission. Dorothy Kelly, James Morrison and George Cooper are important factors in the film's success.

THE VINDICATION (Biograph), April 8.—The shadow of an unjust conviction for theft hangs over the hero of this one-reel drama. His innocence is established in a fairly ingenious manner, and the story is well supplied with dramatic incident.

SOPHIE'S FIGHTING SPIRIT (Essanay), April 8.—Margaret Joslin carries off the honors in this one-reel farce. She has able assistance from Victor Potel and Harry Todd, but the female member of the Potel-Joslin-Todd trio earns most of the laughs by her strenuous fun-making.

HER GETHSEMANE (Vitagraph), April 8.—There is a real pathos in this one-reel photoplay, but an unexpected "happy ending" relieves the tension. Anne Schaefer plays the leading role with feeling and skill. J. Carleton Weatherby and Estelle Allen also merit favorable mention.

THE MISER'S LEGACY (Biograph), April 9.—Another of those gripping little one-reel dramas that fairly mesmerize the attention. The story picks up speed with each new incident, sways the spectator at will, and races on to the denouement with compelling power. Harry Carey, Chas. H. West and Claire McDowell lend efficient aid by their excellent acting.

HE WAS A TRAVELING MAN (Kalem), April 9.—This one-reel farce is a "happy thought" on the part of the author. Life on the road may not resemble the adventures of this "Knight of the Grip," but his troubles are the source of much amusement, so no further excuse is needed. George H. Wheeler is the traveling salesman. Gerald Meyton and Walter B. Etton are a pair of lively bellboys.

THE STROKE OF FATE (Lubin), April 9.—Harry Chandlee's one-reel play is as dramatic as its name implies. It never strays from the beaten path of convention, but its progress is always interesting, with virtue triumphant at the end. Edgar Jones, Louise Huff and Joseph Kaufman enact the triangle.

MAN OVERBOARD (Selig), April 9.—John Lancaster, Lillian Leighton, Elsie Greeson and Sydney Smith make this one-reel farce thoroughly enjoyable. Considerable novelty is revealed in the story, many of the scenes taking place on board of a steamer.

THEY LOVED HIM SO (Vitagraph), April 9.—Farce of the finest quality abounds in this one-reel photoplay. Its humor bears a close relation to life, and its characters are human beings; they do not obey the author's bidding merely for the sake of the laugh. Flora Finch, Jay Dwiggins and Kate Price are responsible for most of the merriment.

THE BROODING HEART (Biograph), April 10.—An ultra-sentimental one-reel drama, its gloom relieved by the character of a little waif, who takes a dead child's place in the heart of a grieving mother. Isabel Rea shows considerable emotional power in the latter part.

AN UNPAID RANSOM (Edison), April 10.—A well conceived and interesting one-reel drama, that moves rapidly to a satisfactory and a logical finish. The film is without a superfluous incident. Augustus Phillips fits readily into the leading part, and Bessie Learn, Carleton King, Frank Trenor and Charlotte De Felice give him excellent support.

ANDY OF THE ROYAL MOUNTED (Essanay), April 10.—Marguerite Clayton, Harry Todd and Lee Willard are G. M. Anderson's chief support in this one-reel tale of the Canadian Mounted Police. The drama does not fall below the "Broncho Billy" standard and permits him to appear in the uniform of the celebrated Canadian "Rough Riders."

HE COULDN'T EXPLAIN (Lubin), April 10.—A short-reel farce, written by E. W. Sargent, in which occurs one of those comedy entanglements that stage husbands are given to bringing upon themselves, and which are guaranteed to furnish comic diversion to the average spectator. Eloise Willard, George Welch, Mabel Paige and Roy Byron handle the situations with skill.

CLOTHES COUNT (Lubin), April 10.—Written by E. W. Sargent and on the reel with "He Couldn't Explain," Mae Hotley, Ben Walker and Prof. Chira bring out the amusing points of this little comedy to the best advantage.

General Film Company Specials.

THE SECOND COMMANDMENT (Kalem), April 5.—Love, heredity and three religions battle for supremacy in this three-part film drama, by Harry O. Hoyt. Sun Worship, Catholicism and Christian Science are the trio of beliefs in the struggle, with "Mother Eddy's" doctrine the winner. The character drawing and human interest in the drama are of excellent quality, but in fashioning his material into a play, the author displays no great amount of skill. Producer Kenean Buel, Guy Coombs, Dorothy Bernard John C. Mecklin and Anna Nillson have all done their work well.

THE GENTLEMAN BURGLAR (Selig), April 5.—Another variant of the "Raffles" theme and an unusually good one this two-reel crime play has the speed, concentration and engrossing story requisite to the success of this class of drama. The production and filming are both commendable. William Stowell doubles "The Gentleman Burglar" and a society man with much skill, and Lillian Marshall plays a lady "gumshoe" with equal success.

THE BRIDGE ACROSS (Biograph), April 6.—Sectional pride—the oft-repeated tale of the Southern girl and the Northern boy and their stormy romance—is the theme of this two-part drama. Author, producer and actors have handled their material with sympathetic skill, and the result is as welcome as a repetition of one of the familiar Southern airs. Jack Drumeir, Marie Newton and Jack Mulhull do especially fine work.

THE LADY OF THE SNOWS (Essanay), April 6.—Mrs. Carter Harrison, of Chicago, who is the author of this three-reel photoplay, has furnished an interesting love story, and has also given the producer wide scope in the way of scenes and settings. But there are no big moments in the play shown in action. The wrecking of the train seems little more than an incident. The mountings and the acting of Richard C. Travers, Sydney Ainsworth, Ernest Maupain, Edna Mayo and Betty Scott, are all that could be desired.

THE TIMID MR. TOODLES (Vitagraph), April 6.—Sidney Drew's part in this two-reel comedy suits him perfectly. As the man who becomes a hero in spite of himself, he lets no funny point escape. Mrs. Drew, Courtlandt Van Deusen and Betty Gray lend valuable assistance Amusing from start to finish.

THE THUMBPRINTS ON THE SAFE (Episode No. 11 of "The Girl Detective" Series) (Kalem), April 7.—Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson on page 1941, issue of March 27.

THE CYPHER KEY (Lubin), April 7.—A three-part drama by George W. Terwilliger, with a battle of wits between a "Yankee" and a South American as its motive, the scenes shift from the land to the sea and even up in the air, a race between an automobile and an aeroplane being one of the main incidents. This race is kept up later between two speed boats, and the finish is full of excitement. Earl Metcalfe, Mary Keane and Herbert Fortier head the list of principals.

MR. CARLSON OF ARIZONA (Lubin), April 8.—Romaine Fielding is responsible for the writing and the producing of this two-reel drama. The most refreshing thing about the picture is Mr. Carlson as impersonated by the author-producer. The story of Mr. Carlson's adventures, and also his love affair, are interesting in themselves but it is the personality of the title role gentleman that does most for the play. Vinnie Burns demonstrates her right to become Mrs. Carlson.

THE STONING (Edison), April 9.—Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison on page 1941, issue of March 27.

AN OPAL RING (Essanay), April 9.—This two-reel drama, written by Justus Miles Forman, is a regular George Barr McCutcheon romance, with a foreign princess and a dashing young American to fall in love and be parted by the lady's high station. The spirit of modern romance brings many dramatic happenings to the fore, during the unfolding of the plot. The production has been carefully looked after and the company, headed by Beverly Bayne, is thoroughly competent.

THE GIRL ON THE TRESTLE (Episode No. 22 of the "Hazards of Helen" Railroad Series) (Kalem), April.—A successful attempt to outdo any of her previous exploits must be credited to "dare-devil" Helen in the present instalment of her life-endangering record. The Kalem production of these Railroad dramas could not be excelled. Leo D. Maloney and Rex Downs contribute character impersonations that ably second the work of Miss Holmes.

THE RETURN OF MAURICE DONNELLY (Vitagraph), April 10.—This three-part photoplay affords the last word in thrills. Edgar Allan Poe never excelled the gripping, awe-inspiring power of the scenes during which Maurice Donnelly is electrocuted and then brought back to life. One mistake of the producer would have been sufficient to turn the entire episode into ridicule; the mistake has not been made. Wm. Addison Lathrop, the author; William Humphrey, the producer; Leo Delaney, Leah Baird, Mary Maurice, Josephine Earle and the actor who impersonates the electrical expert, have labored together in perfect harmony, and produced a work of exceptional merit.

Mutual Film Corporation.

WHEN LOVE TOOK WINGS (Keystone), April 1.—Roscoe Arbuckle plays the lead in this picture, which is rather a good one of the kind. Some interesting aeroplane scenes appear in the course of the production, but love takes wings when Roscoe finds out that his lady love is baldheaded, and wears a curly wig to hide this defect.

AMBROSE'S LOFTY PERCH (Keystone), April 3.—Mack Swain appears in this costume number as a king on his throne, surrounded by dancing girls. He chooses one girl but the hero abducts her. The action is of burlesque character and contains considerable interesting nonsense.

DROPPINGTON'S DEVILISH DEED (Keystone), April 5.—Chester Conklin has the floor a good part of the time in this picture, which is an exceptionally good one of its kind. Droppington is a stage hand at a country theater, and as a climax to his misdeeds causes the breaking up of the show when in all good faith he turns the full strength of the hose on what he supposes to be a fire in the theater. The fact of the matter is Mephisto was performing some of his magical tricks, hence the smoke. The result is very comical.

THE LITTLE MOTHER (Majestic) April 6.—An exceptionally pleasant picture in which a little girl (Violet Wilkey) leaves the orphan asylum, from which her baby brother has been taken for adoption by a wealthy couple, in search of the child of whom she is very fond. She discovers the whereabouts of the child's new home, and steals the baby from the automobile while its foster mother is bringing something from the house. She is found later asleep on a park bench with her baby brother clasped in her arms. Her persistence results in room being found for her also in the new home.

THE RENT JUMPERS (Keystone), April 8.—A low comedy number of very ordinary quality. Most of the scenes occur in a boarding house. The landlord runs around minus his trousers; there is the usual rivalry over the girl. The humor of this is not very strong.

JUST "KIDS" (Princess), April 9.—Another comedy offering in which the Thanhouser Kidlet and Leland Benham make things hum for their bachelor uncle. The plot is a mere trifle, but the action is lightly amusing.

BURGLARS BY REQUEST (Royal), April 10.—The husband and wife are afraid of burglars and each, for a joke, requests a friend to rob the house. A real thief appears and complicates matters. This is quite amusing in a quiet way and is well photographed.

BY FAIR MEANS OR FOWL (Komic), April 11.—A country comedy with a number of interesting rube types, portrayed by Elmer Booth, Fay Tincher and others. The plot unfortunately is not strong and in spite of good photography and promising first scenes the production is only fairly entertaining.

HIS BACHELOR DINNER (Reliance), April 12.—Jack attends a stag dinner, at which he is the thirteenth man. This is followed by a nightmare in which he is visited by a skeleton and other ghostly visions. This is somewhat vague in treatment and, while the intention is undoubtedly humorous, some of the scenes are quite unpleasant. It makes only a fair offering.

PERSISTENCE WINS (Beauty), April 13.—Virginia Kirtley, Joseph Harris and Webster Campbell appear in this love story. Peter is a persistent suitor who will not take no for an answer. This is not very strong in plot, but is, nevertheless, quite pleasing as a light subject.

THE LITTLE MATCHMAKERS (Majestic), April 13.—An excellent little comedy-drama in which the child actress, Mildred Harris, is starred. The children, Mildred and Paul, sister and brother, respectively, to the sweethearts, determine that a successful match shall be made between them. Some prettily comic incidents occur in the opening of the story, which later merges into the near tragic when the school takes fire and Paul, previously locked up by his teacher for misconduct, is forgotten. This latter incident is the beginning of the end when the sweethearts decide to patch up a quarrel which has taken place between them. Paul Willis is the Paul of the picture and Margie Wilson plays the adult feminine lead.

THE WISHING STONE (American), April 14.—A love story, with pretty rural settings. The boy and girl wade in the same pool and make their wishes on a big boulder. Later in life they fall in love and the wishes come true. A pleasing little romance.

THE JOB AND THE JEWELS (Reliance), April 14.—This creditable production has been directed by Arthur Mackley with Charles Gorman, Charles Cosgrove and Florence Crawford in the cast. The picture is intended to be of moral use to its audiences. There is originality to the story which treats of how a reformed burglar, now a dishwasher in a restaurant, saves his former pal from serving a prison term by restoring to their rightful owner the jewels that the pal had stolen.

THE ACTOR AND THE RUBE (Falstaff), April 16.—A fresh comedy number, in which a rube, unlucky at cards and love, decides to visit New York. Here he meets an actor, portrayed by Riley Chamberlin, who makes up as the rube and goes back to his home town. He fools the inhabitants and wins both at love and cards. This conception is original and pleasing.

HIS LUCKLESS LOVE (Keystone), April 18.—This story of a flirtatious married man contains some new and highly diverting incidents. It is a characteristic number, full of laughing moments.

BIG BROTHER BILL (Thanhouser), April 18.—The Kidlet has a friend who is always talking about his big brother. She goes to sleep and dreams of him. This makes a very fair juvenile subject and is well photographed.

HUNGRY HANK AT THE FAIR (Royal), April 24.—A grotesque rube character known as Hank appears at a county fair, meeting all comers at boxing. An electrical device is used to knockout his opponents. This presents a good situation, but the humor only becomes moderately strong.

Mutual Film Corporation Specials

TRAPPED (Serial Publication Corp.) (Reliance), April 7.—Instalment XIII of the Runaway June Series.—Much of the action in this number is not to be taken very seriously. The scene on the island, picturing the prophet and his tribe of dancing girls, was almost of a burlesque character. At the same time many of the incidents are interesting. One of the girls does a high dive from the cliff a la Annette Kellermann. She then swims out to a boat and saves June from the half-wit who is threatening her. The glimpse of the octopus was interesting. All of the Bermuda settings are pleasingly pictured.

STATION CONTENT (Reliance), April 10.—A two-reel railroad story, with Wallace Reid, Catherine Henry and Ben Lewis in the cast. The development is conventional, beginning with the young operator and his sweetheart at the station. Later they marry; the second man appears repeatedly. Years pass, they lose their child, and the young husband, now superintendent, neglects the wife. She turns to Hilton for sympathy, but at the old station finds the baby's doll. She then saves the superintendent's special from collision with a loose car of nitro. The suspense in the latter scenes is good; the photography is pleasing throughout.

THE FENCING MASTER (Majestic), April 11.—A fine two-reel drama enacted by a strong cast, including Thomas Jefferson, Teddy Sampson, George Walsh and Frank Bennett. The scenes are laid in France and all of the settings are artistic and attractive. The story of the paralyzed fencing master who is roused to a point where he is able to fight a duel with M. Marode is new and full of interest. The production is much above the average in every way.

THE POET OF THE PEAKS (American), April 12.—This two-reel production abounds in beautiful settings. It is, however, too sentimental in character to allow of any vivid realism. Vivian Rich plays the role of the woman who had no heart, David Lythgoe is the poet whose quaint cabin home is on Sunrise mountain, a beautiful spot, by-the-way, Harry Von Meter is the man of the world who passes through without serious harm, and is able to give advice to the foolish poet, who, fascinated by the woman's charms, leaves his mountain home to follow her to the city. The close of the picture shows him returning a maddened wreck to his home, and later meeting his death following his fantasy over the dangerous cliffs.

IN THE GRIP OF POVERTY (Serial Publication Corp) (Reliance), April 14.—No. 14 of the "Runaway June" series. June is no sooner rescued from the island by Blythe than she falls into the hands of some Bermuda apaches. This weird band of desperadoes forces her to dance with the other girls. Two of the band, Pierre and Marie, indulge in a stabbing affray and Pierre throws the girl off a high cliff into the water. The reel closes with all hands leaving on the boat for New York, Ned following. The series comes to a conclusion with the next instalment.

THE UNDERTOW (Thanhouser), April 20.—A two-reel crook story, not very new in plot but abounding in action of a stirring sort. The country youth goes to the city, where he falls in with bad company. He is caught in a police raid, but saved by the detective's daughter. He promises her to reform and tries to do so, but the gang attempts to lure him back. This is a typical crook production. The photography in the first reel was taken on a gray day; it is much better in the second.

THE DISILLUSIONMENT OF JANE (Broncho), April 21.—This entertaining two-reel offering pictures the escape of a young convict from the penitentiary. He goes to the country under an assumed name, where he makes love to a pretty country girl. The rural scenes are very natural and appealing. The girl gives up her rustic sweetheart for the city chap but has her eyes opened after the runaway during their elopement. She discovers her father's money on his person, he having taken it from the hiding place in the old well. The scenes in the second reel are full of action and hold the attention closely. A good offering of its kind.

THE ARTIST'S MODEL (Domino), April 22.—An Ince and Spencer production with Violet McMillen, George Fisher and others in the cast. An artist named Kenton advertises for a model and procures a pretty German girl with whom he falls in love. She receives an offer from another artist and goes to his studio. He is a reprobate and makes an attack upon her. Kenton arrives just in time to save her from his clutches. The production has a strong atmosphere of the studio. The plot itself contains many familiar situations, but holds the attention quite well throughout.

THE RIDDLE OF THE WOODEN LEG (Kaybee), April 23.—An unusually good two-reel detective story, with Leona Hutton, Jack Nelson and others in the cast. The girl traces the mysterious thefts to the secretary of the wealthy man, who had used a wooden leg in order to leave false clues. All of the mystery is worked out in full view of the observer, which usually proves the most interesting in a story of this kind. This holds the attention closely.

ENOCH ARDEN (Mutual Masterpictures) (Majestic), April.—This is a beautiful four-reel film version of Tennyson's poem, which has been produced by William Cabanne and appears on the program of Mutual Masterpictures. Lillian Gish plays the sympathetic role of Annie, Alfred Paget that of Enoch, and Wallace Reid that of Philip. Special mention is due the appropriateness of the settings of the production. There must surely be little fault if any to be found with the picture in any way. Its development is quaint, and beautiful and human. The players are deserving of great credit, as is also the director.

THE OUTLAW'S REVENGE (Mutual Masterpicture) (Reliance), April.—A graphic four-reel offering, picturing a very stirring and convincing way a series of incidents in Mexico. The outlaw's sisters are set upon by the federal officers; one of them shoots herself to escape their clutches and the other dies after losing her mind. The outlaw then sets about getting his revenge, in regular Monte Cristo style. There are many tragic happenings in this based on real life, and some of them are shocking. At the same time the story adheres faithfully to the way they do things in Mexico, the scenes are actually taken there and no effort has been spared to mount the production on a big scale. The cast is pleasing and the offering is in every way a strong one of the red-blooded type.

A MAN AND HIS MATE (Mutual Masterpictures) (Reliance), April.—One of the Mutual Masterpictures, based on the play and novel of H. R. Durant, and directed by John G. Adolfi. The story is an excellent one; that is, its plot is alluring, but again not new. Its development in four reels is in most part good. One glaring mistake has been made, namely, the substituting of a white man for the Chinaman, one of the main characters of the play. For in spite of the fact that Sam De Grasse has done well with the role of Choo, he is not by form or feature a convincing Chinaman. Choo is in a way an idealized type, the character of which has been, on the other hand, admirably interpreted by De Grasse. Henry Woodruff does excellent work in the role of Harry Ogden and playing opposite him is Gladys Brockwell

NIOBE (Famous Players), April.—Reviewed by Lynde Denig on page 400 issue of April 17.

Pathe Exchange.

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 27 1915, March 29-April 3.—Besides the usual war scenes, this issue shows the students of the University of Wisconsin at their quadrennial celebration, dancing the snake dance in the street, Winnifred Stoner, the child who speaks several languages at twelve years of age, and the dynamiting of the land which has been chosen for the location of the Metropolitan Golf links.

Pathe Exchange Specials.

THE PURSUIT OF PLEASURE (Balboa), April 19-24.—The second of the "Who Pays?" series with Ruth Roland and Henry King. The story of the production is good, and has been written by William Ritchie. The sub-titles have, unfortunately, not been well chosen. In many instances the intention of the picture is quite obvious enough without any sub-title, and is in perfect keeping without verbal explanation. The story, which has been filmed in two reels, treats of the pleasure loving daughter of an old-fashioned clergyman. She finally elopes with a rich young man, and gives herself over to the superficial pleasures of life in preference to rearing children. The outcome and the moral of the story is satisfactory, and minus its subtitles, the production could be highly recommended.

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 26 1915, March 29-April 3.—Interesting items of this isssue are the opening of the bicycle racing season at Velodrome, Vice-President Marshall at the Panama Exposition, at Sandy Hook a 14-inch gun for the Panama Canal is tested, the village of Sommeiles, France, reduced to a mass of fallen masonry, English youth learning how to use the bayonet, a trench periscope in use in the British army, and the Flohro comic cartoon emblematic of Japan's attitude toward China, and the effect of the interest taken in the matter by the other powers.

LE TAMANDUA, April 19-24.—This film contains an interesting tions which would doubtless be made, this picture would be presentable, and the acrobatic tendencies of the little animal. This is on the same reel with "He Takes Well at Parties."

HE TAKES WELL AT PARTIES, April 19-24.—An interesting farce comedy in which the polished heavy man, suave and socially brilliant is shown by the eccentric hero to be a villainous thief. There is plenty of good comedy in this production.

JUST NUTS, April 19-24.—A rough and tumble picture of the Charles Chaplin sort, containing a great deal of very good farce comedy. It is warranted to please most audiences. The "Nuts" just do a lot of foolish things that make people laugh.

TOLEDO, SPAIN, April 19-24.—An interesting series of views of the ancient city of Toledo, which was formerly occupied by the Moors. Among the places shown are Le Puerta Visagra, La Puerta Del Sol, the courtyard of the Royal Military Academy, the Cathedral the erection of which was begun in 1227 on the site of an ancient Moorish mosque, and a view of the Tagus river and the Alcantara bridge, built by the Moors. This is on the same reel with "Bridge Building and Railway Track Laying by the French Army."

BRIDGE BUILDING AND RAILWAY TRACK LAYING BY THE FRENCH ARMY, April 19-24.—This illustrates the remarkably deft manner in which this work is carried on by the French army, working in groups and proving again the truth of the old adage, "Many hands make light work." There is probably half an ordinary reel of this subject.

United Film Service.

UNCLE'S LAST LETTER (Superba), April 20.—In this picture Uncle's supposed decease causes considerable damage to be done to his house and belongings by relatives eager to find his will. The attempt made to get the comedy over is rather obvious.

YOU NEED A DOCTOR (Starlight), April 22.—With a few eliminations which would doubtless be made, this picture would be presentable, providing a good deal of enjoyment to many audiences. The comedy is of course built along farce lines, and shows a horse doctor who is down on his luck, starting into doctor human beings. He sends his pal out with a club to knock a few people down, so that he can have the job of bringing them round again. Other methods of gaining business are also used. Aubrey and Kendig are the comedians.

THE GIRL WITH THE CAMERA (Premier), April 24.—A western subject which is rather interesting. To avoid suspicion on the part of a character for whom the authorities are looking, the daughter of the sheriff is sent into the canyon to photograph all suspects. Presumably the man they are after is later shot by the girl, but not before he has fallen in love with her. The ending is rather unsatisfactory.

Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

ANIMATED WEEKLY, No. 161, April 7.—Sidelights on the war, an automobile race at Venice, Cal., views of the San Francisco fair buildings, Champion Jess Willard in training, and other features appear in this number.

THE THINGS IN THE BOTTOM DRAWER (Laemmle), April 18.—A story of pretty sentiment and fairly strong in plot with Gene Hathaway, Albert MacQuarrie and others in the cast. The husband and wife separate but later are reunited by memories of their child. Good photography helps this.

WILD BLOOD (Imp), April 19.—A feud story with a new twist in it. Wm. Garwood and Violet Mersereau play the leads. The girl follows the mountain doctor to the city, vowing to "get his blood," in revenge for a shooting. He allows his blood to be transfused to her veins during an illness, not knowing who she was. This of course changes her hatred to love. The story is quite well constructed and the plot is new. The photography is good.

THE FATAL KISS (Joker), April 19.—A low comedy number with Max Asher, Gale Henry and Wm. Franey in the cast. Max carries some flowers to a chorus lady friend and when he returns home the wife finds an imprint of a kiss on his cheek. There are amusing moments in this and it makes a very fair offering of the kind.

EDDIE'S AWFUL PREDICAMENT (Nestor), April 20.—A pleasing comedy number, with Eddie Lyons, Victoria Forde and Lee Moran in the cast. Eddie hasn't enough money to pay for the dinner, so he robs a blind man. He is caught, but the blind man sympathetically loans him even more money. A laughable conceit, nicely presented.

THE AFFAIR OF THE TERRACE (Rex), April 20.—A dramatic number, featuring Ben Wilson, Dorothy Phillips and others. Ben Wilson plays the part of an amateur sleuth who unravels the mysterious death of a woman, thrown over a terrace by a man in monk's costume. This is well pictured and presents a good mystery of a "shivery" sort.

THE FEAR WITHIN (Big U), April 22.—A story, written by Bess Meredyth, with Murdock and Albert MacQuarrie and others in the cast. This pictures the way in which a young soldier shows cowardice the first time under fire, but later conquers this and returns to his company. The story is quite complicated and well-acted. It is stronger than the average offering.

HIS SMASHING CAREER (Sterling), April 22.—Ford Sterling appears in this low comedy number as a man with musical ambitions. He gets into a love affair and leads a wild chase in an automobile. His performances in the latter are decidedly interesting. A lively number of the kind.

TWO HEARTS AND A SHIP (Nestor), April 23.—Eddie Lyons, Victoria Forde and Neal Burns appear in this comedy number. The scenes are in Golden Gate harbor just off the exposition grounds. The plot is a fair one and the number proves quite pleasing.

THE ARTIST AND THE VENGEFUL ONE (Victor), April 23.—Harry C. Myers appears in this as a young artist in love with the district attorney's daughter, impersonated by Rosemary Theby. Brinsley Shaw is a released convict who plans revenge on the girl's father. There is a fierce gun fight toward the close in the district attorney's home. The number is not fully convincing in plot, but has plenty of action and holds the attention well. The photography is good.

LOVE AND HANDCUFFS (Powers), April 24.—A mountain feud story of the conventional type, with Sydney Ayres, Doris Pawn and others in the cast. The hero is a secret service agent investigating the illicit still run by the girl's father. The situations have been worked over in previous offerings; at the same time the photography and general atmosphere of the production are good.

Universal Film Mfg. Company Specials.

A GIRL OF THE NIGHT (Rex), April 18.—A two-reel slum story, written by Ida May Park, with Pauline Bush and Lon Chaney in the leading roles. Nance is induced by Jerry and other members of the gang to visit Langham's house and obtain the evidence collected by the prosecuting attorney. She is apprehended by Langham, who befriends her and offers both her and Jerry a chance. Later she sacrifices this chance by shielding the lawyer's wife. This is well photographed and worked out quite strongly. It is a drama of motives and appeals to the sympathies, though it is not in every way a finished production.

THE HOUSE OF MYSTERY (Universal Special Release), April 19.—Episode No. 7 of "The Black Box" series. Quest visits the mysterious house in company with Prof. Ashleigh and his assistants, seeking Craig. The latter is discovered but saved through a trick; the house is then mysteriously blown up. These incidents are coherent and interesting. Then follows a pursuit of Craig, who has fled to a vessel manned by river pirates. By a ruse Craig again evades his followers. This instalment is simpler in construction and more easily followed than previous numbers.

THE STOOL PIGEON (Victor), April 19.—A crook story by H. G. Stafford of unusual interest, in two reels, with J. Warren Kerrigan, George Pierolat and Vera Sisson in the cast. The latter doubles as a society girl and member of the gang. Kerrigan plays the part of a young fellow out of work who becomes the dupe of a polite society thief, and unwittingly aids in an attempted jewel robbery at a reception. The story is cleverly worked out and holds the interest firmly.

MAVIS OF THE GLEN (Laemmle), April 21.—A three-reel offering of strong appeal, with Robert Leonard and Ella Hall in the leading roles. The girl is raised by a hermit in the woods until she is 18 years of age. Then the hero appears, marries her and takes her back to civilization and plenty of unforeseen trouble. Louise Orth makes an interesting part of the cold, snobbish sister who creates jealousy and misunderstanding between the young couple. This rises above the average production in almost every way and is splendidly photographed. Throughout the entire three reels there is no lack of interest. A good offering.

THE LADDER OF FORTUNE (Rex), April 22.—An enjoyable two-reel number, with Ben Wilson, Dorothy Phillips, Joseph Girard and others in the cast. The start is full of action and scenes are attractive throughout. The Italian troubadour clashes with his would-be rival; a duel follows and he flees to America under the impression that he has killed Navarro. But the latter recovers. The girl follows her lover to this country, with Navarro giving pursuit. The American scenes continue the interest very well. This number contains considerable dash and has a story of an enjoyable nature to tell. The photography is also pleasing.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE YELLOW CURL PAPERS (Imp), April 23.—A two-reel comedy number, written by Clem Easton and enacted by a cast including Wm. Garwood and Violet Mersereau. The story is a yarn in which the friend of the young actress steals her curl papers, consisting of one hundred dollar bills, in order to make a newspaper sensation. A chicken thief is suspected of the crime. This does not get up much excitement, the idea being rather slight for a two-reel plot. Considerable padding is necessary and the climax is weak. A fair offering, which would have been stronger in one reel.

THE WAR OF THE WILD (Bison), April 24.—A two-reel jungle story, featuring lions, leopards and their cubs, a trained elephant. The latter makes the hit of the production by interfering in a fight and carrying away a man, whom he rolls over a high cliff. The number is a characteristic one, combining thrills with amusing incidents. There is also a battle scene between the animal hunters and a tribe of Arabs. Wellington A. Playter makes his first appearance with his company, succeeding Wm. Clifford, the hero of many thrilling productions. Mr. Playter is over six feet in height and does admirable work in this number.

Felix F. Feist.

ONE of the most aggressive and best known all-round film man in the United States is Felix F. Feist, the head of the Celebrated Players Film Company, of Chicago, which markets the Alliance Program in Illinois and Indiana. Mr. Feist was born and raised in New York City, and for years was associated with his brother, Leo, in the music publishing business, and was the author of several of the earlier hits of the Feist organization.

Felix F. Feist.

He later became advertising man for the Kinemacolor Company, and subsequently, with headquarters in Chicago, he represented that firm in the states west of and including Illinois. From this position he became connected with Alfred Hamburger, the Chicago "popular price show king," as head of his exchange and booking departments. His next move was to join the staff of the Celebrated Players Film Company, where, after four months, he was elevated to the presidency and general management.

Under Mr. Feist's direction the Celebrated Players exchange has become one of the largest and most reliable film purveyors in the Union, and in the near future will open a branch in Indianapolis, which will be followed by the placing of other exchanges in strategic centres in his territory.

Mr. Feist is now in New York, and upon his return to Chicago he will see his concern established in new and greatly enlarged quarters at 207 South Wabash avenue, in the heart of the Chicago film district.

In addition to controlling the Alliance output, his firm owns the rights to Annette Kellermann in "Neptune's Daughter," and several other of the larger film productions.

Herbert Lubin.

HERBERT LUBIN, the president and general manager of the Allied Features, Inc., of Montreal and Toronto, is one of the leading film men in the Dominion.

Mr. Lubin, who entered the picture business during its infancy and has practically grown up with it, received his early training in New York, and for the last seven years has been a resident of Canada.

Herbert Lubin.

Early to realize the wonderful possibilities of the multiple-reel film offering, his energies were devoted almost from the first to this class of pictures, and today it is not too much to say that his concern is enjoying the prestige earned by years of experience as feature purveyors.

The Allied Features, Inc., is the sole handler of the Alliance Program in Canada, and, notwithstanding the fact that the war is slightly depressing business, Mr. Lubin's concern reports excellent bookings.

The Allied Exchange in Montreal boasts of being one of the finest equipped film houses in Canada, while the Toronto branch is a close second.

United Producing Companies Active.

Edwin August Joins With a New Company—Others Are Busy With New Staffs of Players.

CLOSELY following the announcement that the Colonial Motion Picture Company will release Cameo Comedies starring the Broadway comedian Harry Kelly, of "Watch Your Step" fame, on the United Program comes the statement that arrangements have been completed whereby Edwin August is to head a company adding a new release to the United under the name of Pyramid Pictures. Mr. August has surrounded himself by an exceptionally strong cast with Ruth Blair and Iva Sheppard as his co-stars.

Director Frank Beal is at the Ideal Studios in Los Angeles where he has joined Webster Cullison and Carl Leviness. These directors had already started to add to their stock companies which now number eighteen experienced screen players. Mr. Beal's work had been laid out for him before he left New York. He is now busy producing high class domestic stories and refined comedies. Webster Cullison is devoting his talents to Western dramas and melodramas, while Carl Leviness is giving his attention to the producing of psychological dramas and human interest stories. So much for the Ideal.

About the time Frank Beal started for the coast Director Frank Hutchinson of the Superba Company gathered a special company about him in New York and started for Savannah, Ga. Among the players corralled by Mr. Hutchinson were Edith Thornton, W. E. Browning, Rolinda Bainbridge, David L. Don, Suzzanne Willis, Geraldine McCann, Lizzie Conway, Cora Becker, Peggy Charland and Marguerite Wank.

Following the Superba's move came word from the Mittenthal Brother's studio in Yonkers that carpenters were busily engaged making room for extra activity on the part of the Starlight Comedy Company. Eddie Redway has been added to the staff of directors while James Aubrey and Walter Kendig, the leading comedians, have been surrounded by stock companies of extra strength and numbers. The enlargement of the studio will also include new office space for the business heads of the Starlight Company as well as more spacious quarters for the scenario and advertising departments.

The reason for Arthur Smallwood's extra activity has also been partially explained by the taking over and remodeling of the Cliffside Studios by the Smallwood Film Corporation which has just moved its producing companies from Yonkers, New York, to the vicinity of Fort Lee, New Jersey. The Smallwood Brothers have been producing Grandin films for the United Program, featuring Ethel Grandin. They have now more than doubled their acting company and producing staff so that they can stage society and psychological dramas with Edwin August, Ruth Blair and Iva Sheppard as added attractions for the United. O. S. Lee is the business manager for the new Cliffside Studios while A. R. Mariner has been engaged as technical director. Ray Smallwood continues to act in the capacity of director in chief giving his personal attention to the Grandin productions.

With the Empress Company at Flushing, Long Island, adding to Joseph Levering's players and arranging for a new company in addition to the stock headed by Marian Swayne; with the Lariat Company announcing the addition of William V. Mong to their forces at the Garden of the Gods Studio, Colorado Springs, and with the recent announcement of important changes and additions in the Premier and Luna Companies, the thawing of the frozen winter trenches finds the United Program producing companies ready for the Spring forward movement with ammunition enough ready and in the making to cause the war correspondents to sharpen up their pencils and watch for scare head developments.

PATHE NEWS CAMERAMAN WOUNDED IN AUSTRIA.

It's a long, long way from New York to the place with the unforgettable, unpronounceable name, Przemysl, but it seems less when one sees certain very fine pictures of the siege in the Pathe News and learns that the Pathe special correspondent, Ercole, who took them, has been wounded and decorated for bravery under trying conditions. While he was turning his camera he was hit by a piece of sharpnel and painfully wounded, but he did not cease to turn and in consequence has been decorated by the Imperial Government of Russia with the Cross of the Order of St. George.

Change at Vitagraph Theater.

"The Lady of the Lighthouse," Featuring Rose Tapley, and Other Interesting Subjects.

A REPRESENTATIVE program of Vitagraph pictures, the majority of the scenarios from the pens of distinguished photoplay authors, has been arranged for the Vitagraph theater for the week commencing Sunday, April 18. The pictures embrace subjects that are educational, dramatic, tragic and those in which the comedy element abounds. A picturization of Helen S. Woodruff's book, "The Lady of the Lighthouse," is the feature, and, while of an educational nature, is of more than ordinary interest because of its dramatic appeal. Miss Woodruff wrote from knowledge obtained at first hand and evolved a story that, produced for the screen by Capt. Harry Lambart, visualizes the magnificent work being done for the blind through the work of the Institute, known to the sightless as the Lighthouse. The action of a decidedly interesting story woven around a ten-year old, motherless boy, who becomes blind through an accident, is interrupted to show the wonderful adaptability of the inmates of this Institution who become adepts in such occupations as basket making, typewriting, modeling, caning of chairs, etc., and the pleasures by which they relax during the period of play. Miss Rose Tapley, Lionel Adams, Charles Wellesley and Reginald Sheffield enact the story of "The Lady of the Lighthouse."

Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew in Paul West's "Boobley's Baby," a story of a doll, a subway seat, a girl and twins, and Anita Stewart and Earle Williams in "The-Sort-of-Girl-Who-Came-from-Heaven," a story that exemplifies that there is "one born every minute," produced by Ralph W. Ince, are two comedies that will vie with the feature for first place on the program. "Strictly Neutral," by Donald I. Buchanan, introducing Flora Finch and Kate Price as the chief characters in a laughing story in which self-preservation is the first law of neutrality, and "The Boarding House Feud," by Eugene Mullin, in which Billy Quirk gets square with a boarding house mistress, the mother of his sweetheart, Constance Talmadge, are representative Vitagraph laugh producing stories. A tense drama entitled, "A Pillar of Flame," completes an attractive program and presents two popular Vitagraph favorites, Norma Talmadge and Harry Morey in a human interest story, in which the ambition of an egotist is purchased with her soul.

New Brooklyn Theater.

Picker and Bennett Acquire Valuable Property for Three Thousand-Seat Photoplay Palace in Flatbush.

MESSRS. PICKER and Bennett, who lease and operate two of the largest and most important photodrama houses in Manhattan—the Burland theater, at 985 Prospect avenue in the Bronx, and the Eighth Avenue theater, at Eighth avenue and 26th street—announce the completion of plans to extend their interests into Brooklyn. With this purpose in view, they have acquired the large vacant plot immediately behind the new important block of stores at the corner of Flatbush avenue and Cortelyou road. This lot has a frontage of 100 feet on Cortelyou road, stretching from immediately behind the stores to 21st street, and is 201 feet deep on 21st street, occupying the corner of Cortelyou road and 21st street. Title to the property was taken on Tuesday, April 6.

Several of the most important theatrical managers in New York will be associated with Messrs. Picker and Bennett in the financing of this enterprise, and in the effort to make it absolutely the leading photodrama house of Brooklyn. The theater, which will be erected with the least possible delay, will be the largest strictly photoplay theater in Brooklyn and will be constructed on most modern and elaborate lines, combining architectural beauty with every appliance for safety and comfort. At present there will be only a small stage, but space will be left for the construction of a large stage with dressing rooms if occasion ever demands. The intention is to have the orchestra seat about 2,000 and the balcony about 800 more. For summer use, moreover, there will be an immense roof garden that should accommodate at least 1,500 people.

Plans are now being drawn by Daniel Malcolm and John P. Benson. The total estimated cost is slightly less than a quarter of a million dollars.

The theater will naturally have an extensive display on Flatbush avenue. On Cortelyou road, at each side of the theater entrance and in front of the theater proper, will be six stores. It is a matter of common knowledge that the crosstown car line, on Cortelyou road, now ending at Flatbush avenue, is soon to be continued across Flatbush avenue.

New Stars for Kalem.

Wilmuth Merkyl and Myrtle Tannehill Will Be Featured in "Broadway Favorites."

IN LINE with the announcement issued by Kalem a few weeks ago, two more stars of nation-wide fame have been engaged to appear in the "Broadway Favorites" productions. These players are Wilmuth Merkyl and Myrtle Tannehill.

Mr. Merkyl has appeared in some of the greatest successes that Broadway has known in recent years and, as the result of his work in these productions, has won a following that makes him a valuable asset. Among the Broadway successes in which he has taken part are "Sari," which enjoyed so long a run at the Liberty theater; "Her Little Highness," which also played at the Liberty theater; "Adele," which opened at the Longacre theater and later moved to the Harris theater, and "The Debutante," which early this season opened at the Knickerbocker.

Wilmuth Merkyl.

John A. Stevens' famous play, "Wife for Wife," has been selected as the "Broadway Favorites" vehicle for Mr. Merkyl. This drama has frequently been pronounced Stevens' best work and has been shown in practically every large city in the country. The stage production has always been an exceptional money-maker.

Miss Tannehill, like Mr. Merkyl, has long been associated with the most successful productions Broadway has known. As the result of her work in some of the roles which she created in this country, Miss Tannehill was sent to London, where she appeared in the same roles and repeated the success scored here. Her very first season as a professional was with no less a star than William Gillette, in "The Admirable Crichton." Miss Tannehill next played in "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." This, in turn, was followed by a role in "Just Out of College," in which the young woman appeared with Max Figman.

Myrtle Tannehill.

The talented young star played the leading role in "Broadway Jones," which was presented at the George Cohan theater. "Snobs," the attraction at the Hudson theater, afforded her another opportunity to display her histrionic ability. Miss Tannehill next appeared in one of the principal roles of "Get-Rich-Quick Wallingford," when that famous production was presented at the Olympic theater, Chicago. She also played the leading role of "The Girl of the Golden West,' on tour. More recently, Miss Tannehill scored on Broadway when she appeared in "A Pair of Sixes," which was presented at the Longacre theater. It was just after she had closed with this success that Kalem received the opportunity to secure the talented star for one of the three-act "Broadway Favorites" productions. Although the name of the photoplay in which she is to appear is being kept under cover for the time, it is asserted that her role in this drama will afford Miss Tannehill one of the best opportunities of her career.

Work on the three-act "Broadway Favorites" feature, "An Innocent Sinner," in which Miss Katherine La Salle enacts the leading role, has just been completed. This Kalem production of Lawrence Marston's famous play will be released in regular service, Monday, May 3. It is interesting to note that immediately upon completing her work in "An Innocent Sinner," Miss La Salle was engaged to play the leading role in "Kick In," now at the Manhattan Opera House.

Dyreda with Metro.

Important Change in Distributing Plans of Big Producing Company.

THROUGH arrangements entered into several weeks ago, and finally consummated this week by Richard A. Rowland, in behalf of the Board of Directors of the Metro Film Corporation, The Dyreda Art Film Corporation, beginning with their next production, will release exclusively on the program of the Metro Pictures Corporation.

Dyreda, under the direction of J. Parker Reed and J. Searle Dawley, and Frank L. Dyer, have recently built a plant at Fifty-ninth street and Broadway, occupying several floors of the building on the southwest corner of those streets. Work is progressing there on "Four Feathers," which will be the first release of that company through the Metro Exchanges.

"Four Feathers" is the latest fictional work of A. E. W. Mason, the virile British author, which created so profound an impression throughout the world, shortly after the beginning of hostilities in Europe. It is a story of a man who redeemed himself after having been condemned as a coward.

Mr. Reed, of the Dyreda company, in speaking of the move that brought him to Metro, said "We have been investigating the principle and method of distribution of the Metro Company ever since the organization, and after fully going over every detail, are under the firm impression that their mutual co-operative plan is the most flexible and logical now existing. We were then prepared to sign to release through that concern. We have in sight twelve big plays which will be made between now and January 1, 1916. After that, I think we will do about twenty-four a year.

"Four Feathers" will probably be released by Metro early in June, or the final week in May.

SELIG "MOVIE SPECIAL" INFORMATION.

Getting Out a Feature

Some Interesting Inside Incidents Connected With the Production of "The Sign of the Rose."

By Thomas H. Ince, Director-General New York Motion Picture Corporation.

FEW laymen are aware of the innumerable difficulties that beset the producer in getting out a film feature; the thousand and one obstacles to be overcome before the film is in a condition to be marketed. Take "The Sign of the Rose" as a fair example of producing difficulties. This feature, a highly sensitive bit of Italian drama, was written by George Beban and played by him with remarkable success on the vaudeville stage. Beban appears in the leading role on the film which has just been completed. Furthermore, he will travel with the film over the country with the same company of players who assisted him, thus inaugurating an additional feature of the spoken and silent drama combined.

George is a most capital fellow, but he is as temperamental as a sail boat in a light wind. He bristles with art-fibers which vibrate on the slightest discordant note. Picture to yourself the temperamental George kicking up a dusty argument with two or three cold, calculating directors whose only master-passion is to line the crowd up in front of the box office and whose synonym for temperament is receipts.

I sometimes believe that "The Sign of the Rose" would have been even a still greater success from the standpoint of dollars and cents if we had inserted a few thousand feet of actual comedy that took place in the studios during its production.

There was the ubiquitous Beban popping up in all four quarters of the studio at once, pouring impassioned appeals out to directors to change a bit of scenery or to send down to Santa Monica to secure a real live baby to give a natural "tone" to a crowd scene. I can still see George tearing his hair out by the roots when a director returned with a dummy infant, of his final appeals to me for a live male kidlet of the species, and of his refusal to go on until we scoured the nearby city and finally signed up a lusty-lunged yearling.

"The Sign of the Rose" teems with crowd scenes. This is one of Beban's particular fortes—these East Side rucks of romantic-looking Latins with a fair sprinkling of other East Siders of different and nondescript nationalities. To get a certain amount of vim in the pictures I sent to New York for some typical East Side denizens, whose characteristic faces earned them a free trip to California and back, together with good pay.

I almost neglected to mention something concerning the clothes worn by Beban in "The Sign of the Rose." The idiosyncrasied George believes in realism with every letter in pyrotechnics.

When Beban wrote "The Sign of the Rose" for vaudeville he cast about for something typically vogueish from the Tuscan point of view in which to appear to advantage. One day he caught sight of an immigrant coming ashore at the Battery. George flanked him and in good Italian offered to take over everything on the stranger's back in return for a fair price paid therefor. The new arrival demurred, thinking Beban no doubt a bit flustered mentally, but when he saw a shining gold piece he closed the deal. George secured the complete outfit, including headgear and footgear, for ten dollars, and despite its notorious age and fears for another hard winter, called it a bargain.

He patched his purchase up, re-inforcing it here and there until he had an excellent suit of clothes, as far as immigrant-excellence in clothes goes. He appeared with it in "The Italian," and it seems to be gaining a lease on life for it is still in appearable condition even after hard usage in "The Sign of the Rose."

In producing a feature the "crowd" picture is invariably the hardest to secure. First, the important characters in the role must be to the fore. Then again, there may be a bit of superb acting in the foreground and some farcical stuff being parceled out in the background. All this must come under the directorial vision and the characters so disposed as to meet the requirements of mechanics and photography.

In "The Sign of the Rose" where there is an excited, surging crowd the difficulty lay not with the principal players but with those engaged in the superficial parts. For example, it was very difficult to convince the crowd that it should be an excited, surging, crowding crowd; and it was doubly difficult to convince the policeman his duty of forcing the crowd back like the dutiful New York policeman of the East Side should. It was necessary to change policemen five times in order to secure a good specimen of near-cop, and the crowd rehearsed one scene alone at least twenty-four times before it could be worked up to that pitch of excitement which called for the camera man.

Features have become the great bulwark of motion pictures, which is natural as well as evolutional because of the fact that a feature calls for a world of work and preparation and the public, therefore, gets more for its money. "The Sign of the Rose" cost us an enormous amount to produce but we do not begrudge the expenditure, knowing that something in motion pictures has been produced which will be a creditable success.

Captain F. E. Kleinschmidt at the Front

A LETTER, dated March 2, to a friend in New York City shows that the well-known Arctic hunter was then at the Austrian Army Headquarters, Feldpost No. 39. Capt. Kleinschmidt states that he has had some of the most exciting and thrilling experiences of his whole life. A few days before writing he had been up in an aeroplane with shrapnel bursting all around and expected to obtain permission from the Austrian general to go up for a second flight the following week and even had prospects of getting a flight into the beleagured fortress of Przemysl. If he got there, we hope he got away before it was captured by the Russians a few days ago.

Capt. Kleinschmidt in the Field Gray Uniform of an Officer.

Many of the officers of both the German and Austro-Hungarian armies are big game hunters and have been much interested in the Arctic hunt and other moving picture films which the captain brought over with him, and we are inclined to believe from the letter above referred to that this has probably resulted in much better luck for Capt. Kleinschmidt than for most of the other war correspondents, who are permitted to get anywhere near the front only occasionally and always under the espionage of an army officer.

The captain's letter shows that he was enjoying the best of health and was receiving every possible courtesy at the hands of the Austrian staff officers, including the use of a handsome motor car. Since his letter was written, our newspapers have reported very heavy fighting in this immediate vicinity and he will very possibly have seen it at close range.

Film Tax Hurts Australia.

Harry G. Musgrove, of Australasian Films, Ltd., Induces American and English Producers to Lower Prices.

AFTER a brief stay in New York, Harry G. Musgrove, secretary of Australasian Films, Ltd., and Roland J. Fisher, London buyer for the same concern, sailed for England on the "Philadelphia" on April 11. Mr. Musgrove plans to return to this city in about three weeks to complete arrangements with American producers that will ease the difficulties of Australian picture men, now saddled with a duty of four cents a foot on imported film.

Mr. Musgrove told a representative of the Moving Picture World that the tax, which went into effect a few months ago, has necessitated important changes in booking and showing films in Australia, where about seventy per cent. of the subjects are of American origin. Pictures from the Continent are taxed according to the same schedule, whereas those from England are allowed a preferential rebate of one cent a foot. It is a permanent measure, not subject to the duration of the war, and Mr. Musgrove believes that the prosperity of Australian film interests depends upon contracts quite different from those that have answered the needs of the past. Australasian Films, Ltd., represents an amalgamation of West, Ltd., Spencer's, Ltd., the Greater J. D. Williams Amusement Company, Amalgamated Pictures and Pathe Freres.

A number of American and English manufacturers, to whom the case has been presented, have been convinced of the justice of lowering prices for Australian buyers. Before returning home, Mr. Musgrove hopes that he will have made others realize the wisdom of the concession.

There are eight hundred picture houses in Australia, and most of them are well patronized; but paying the tax by raising admission prices is said to be out of the question. The problem is being met in two ways: by securing lower rentals, as already mentioned, and by discouraging the craze for first run pictures, thereby diminishing the number of prints in circulation and giving longer life to those on which the duty has been paid. Nominally, the tax was imposed with the intention of increasing production in Australia; but actually, Mr. Musgrove declares, it cannot bring that result, for the good and sufficient reason that there is no possible market to make production profitable.

The eight hundred theaters are insufficient, even providing some manufacturer made pictures good enough to compete with the American output, and there would be no possibility of selling elsewhere. Australasian Films, Ltd., has a studio and a complete laboratory for developing and printing film, but the production is confined to a topical weekly.

Mr. Musgrove said that Australians are looking more and more to America for the bulk of their photoplays. The gigantic industry, however, with its thoroughly developed system of distribution, carrying poor pictures along with good ones, because an exhibitor takes the program, has its drawbacks, as viewed by an outside buyer. He cannot, for example, see the advantage of contracting for four disappointing films in order to get one that would please his patrons; yet with many producers it must be five or none. And most American manufacturers, he finds, have but three classifications for their wares—good, better and best. To admit the possibility of turning out a poor picture is not ethical.

While in New York, Mr. Musgrove visited the Strand and concluded that it is the most thoroughly enjoyable photoplay house in the world. It is probable that new theaters contemplated for Sydney and Melbourne will be modelled along much the same lines.

In commenting on producing conditions in England, Mr. Fisher said that the London Film Company seemed to be making the greatest progress, but he, like Mr. Musgrove, regards America as the natural home for big producing companies. We have a suitable climate, which England lacks, and we can afford large investments, because of the tremendous market both at home and abroad.

DE CROTEAU BUYS AUDITORIUM THEATER.

W. E. De Croteau has purchased the Auditorium theater, Taunton, Mass., from James E. Mavrakos, who opened the house in October last. Owing to the illness of his wife, Mr. Mavrokos was compelled to sell the Auditorium and move to another place. The new owner has had a number of years of experience in various branches of the theatrical business and is confident that he will make the investment a paying venture for him. Mr. De Croteau is not a stranger to the public of Taunton, having visited that city during his previous theatrical connections.

Metro Under Full Steam.

New Feature Agency Has a Long List of Noted Stars in Coming Production.

THE Metro Pictures Corporation, now under full steam and going at a fast clip, startled the trade this week with an offer of twenty-five thousand dollars to Geraldine Farrar, the noted opera singer, for her appearance in a gigantic spectacle of the great historical play, "Barbara Fritchie." Metro expects to secure Barbara Fritchie this week.

The offer was made through Richard Herndon, a theatrical broker, and was communicated to Miss Farrar after she had practically signified her willingness to listen to reason. Mr. Herndon had already spoken to the famous singer and then approached the Metro directors, asking them if they would be interested.

Speaking for the Metro Corporation, Mr. Rowland, president of that concern, said: "We are in the market for the world's greatest stars and our flexible distributing policy permits us, I presume, to go farther than any other firm, to make bids for noted stars and plays. We were instrumental in securing Mr. Faversham for fifteen thousand dollars and have offered another, almost unapproachable star, twenty thousand dollars for one picture. And now when Farrar's name came to us from a most substantial source, we were quick to see the commercial value of the great singer's name and if we are successful it will be a regular Metro release, as will the Faversham and Petrova pictures."

Anyone who knows "Dick" Rowland, as he is familiarily known throughout the trade, will tell you that he seldom talks. The above is a long speech. It is all meat, too.

Olga Petrova, whose screen production "The Heart of a Painted Woman," will be released next Monday, and is now a regular star on the Metro roster, she having contracted with the Popular Plays and Players Company for a period of two years and to appear in sixteen plays. The biggest and best emotional plays will be furnished her.

In addition to Faversham, Petrova and Farrar, if that artist accepts the Metro offer, Orrin Johnson, Jane Grey, Olive Wyndham, Thomas Jefferson, Adelaide Thurston, Emily Stevens, S. Miller Kent, Lionel Barrymore and Edmund Breese will characterize the various Metro releases for the forthcoming three months.

Jeannette Rutland.

IMP RELEASES of the past few weeks, in which Mary Fuller has been starred, have been made considerably more attractive than they might otherwise have been because of the work of Jeannette Rutland, a charming little ingenue, for whom there is predicted a happy future in the photoplay world.

Miss Rutland is a dyed-in-the-wool performer, possessed of all of the qualifications which make for success. Her parents were both active in theatrical life in England a little more than twenty years ago, when she was born in the British Isles; and the atmosphere of the show shop has been the atmosphere in which she has been reared. Her first stage appearance was made when she was eleven years old, the part introducing her in an important role on the legitimate stage.

Jeannette Rutland.

With the Imp Company, Miss Rutland has been fortunate in working with some of the most able of the big Universal concern's artists—both photoplayers and directors—and her development as a motion picture actress has already excited the favorable comment of many of those who have been in a position to observe it carefully during the past few months. In a number of the Mary Fuller pictures she has been entrusted with roles which are a lot more important than are those usually given to ingenues, and in which she has acquitted herself with credit.

A Day With Thanhouser

Head of New Rochelle Organization Shows Some Fine Night Photography—To Build More Studios.

A CAR built for seven, carried nine passengers from New York to New Rochelle on the sparkling and springlike morning of April 12th. And yet "Ruby" Rubenstein, otherwise Leon J. Rubenstein, advertising and publicity manager for the Thanhouser Company, was not quite satisfied as he balanced lightly on the tonneau, somewhere in the vicinity of the windshield, and checked off his guests, gathered from the offices of The Morning Telegraph, Motography, The Evening Mail, The Dramatic Mirror, The Motion Picture News, The Billboard and The Moving Picture World. He wished there was room for more, but there was not. Such are the limitations of a seven-passenger car.

Edwin Thanhouser.

Several hours later—a punctured tire at 250th street and a luncheon party at New Rochelle intervened—Edwin Thanhouser welcomed the delegation. He opened a humidor and distributed cigars with which to cloud the sunshine in his office. He spoke about pictures in general, about his aims for Thanhouser pictures, about his recent accomplishments in night photography, and then invited the opinion of others by showing results in a coming release. It is remarkable; but first to summarize Mr. Thanhouser's talk.

The corporation, recently capitalized for one million dollars, increased from a quarter of a million, is on the verge of considerable enlargements. Deals for property near the present buildings are pending, and unless all signs fail the early summer months will find New Rochelle carpenters hammering on the framework of several new structures. There is going to be plenty of room for all of the seven or eight companies that will have been organized by that time. At present there are six, with the prospect of another within the next few weeks. In addition to the regular Thanhouser releases and the new Falstaff brand—a great pet of Mr. Thanhouser, by the way—four-reel Mutual Masterpieces are being made at the rate of two every five weeks, and in these, as in other films, for that matter, dependence is being placed on a consistent production in all departments and not upon stellar glories.

Mr. Thanhouser smiled at a mention of gossip about his permitting his stars to glimmer elsewhere. Until he returned from abroad, he said, he was not conscious of having any celebrities in his employ. Furthermore, the notion of founding a business on a personality, especially when that personality is shot through with the vagaries of an artistic temperament, does not impress him as being sound. He wants good actors, not stars, and testimony that he is ready to keep them is found in the instances of several men who worked in his Milwaukee stock company long years ago. Eugene Moore, now a director, is one of them.

The policy, as expressed by Mr. Thanhouser, is to build up the reputation of a brand by maintaining pictures on a consistent level that exhibitors may know what to expect from week to week. Slapstick, he believes, is being well done by a number of companies and there is no need for more of it. With light, clean comedy, calculated to draw a smile, if not an out-and-out laugh, it is another matter, and right here he sees an opening for Falstaff films. "The Actor and the Rube" was shown as a sample of the style to be followed in this brand and there was no gainsaying the pleasing quality of the subject and the skill displayed in its treatment.

Returning to the night photography, the truly atmospheric effects possible at the Thanhouser plant, were convincingly illustrated in a single reel Civil War drama called "Their One Love." Only twenty men are used in the battle scenes, yet in so far as the spectator is concerned, with the soldiers rushing into the narrow zones of light and fading as quickly into impenetrable darkness, there might be hundreds. Even apart from the notable photographic accomplishment, "Their One Love" is a thoroughly good picture in which the heart interest is strong.

All of Mr. Thanhouser's guests expressed approval, whereupon "Ruby" led the way to the studio and in the course of time pointed to seven chairs placed in a jury box. Remaining entirely mysterious about the meaning of it all, he insisted that the seven chairs be occupied while a camera man focused on the seven occupants, namely: Wen Milligan, Lloyd Robinson, Wid Gunning, George D. Proctor, Horace Fuld, Charles R. Condon and Lynde Denig. No doubt "Ruby" will phrase the verdict in his own way. His use for yet another picture, in which Mr. Thanhouser stands in the center of a group displaying unlighted cigars, is less easily fathomed.

Artistic Stage Setting

Arthur Siedle, of the Metropolitan Staff Builds Lobby Scene for Kalem.

ARTHUR SIEDLE, Technical Director for the Metropolitan Opera Company, has just completed a design for a magnificent hotel lobby, for Kalem Company. This lobby will be used in Kalem's forthcoming detective series, "The Mysteries of the Grand Hotel."

As is well known, Mr. Siedle controls all the sets used in the Metropolitan Opera House. These are concededly the most magnificent in the world. "La Giaconda," "Eurydice," "Aida," and "Orpheus and Eurydice," are a few of the operas containing sets which embody Mr. Siedle's ideas.

Kalem Hotel Lobby Scene.

The illustration shows the design prepared by this eminent authority on stage settings. It is asserted that, when completed, this set will be one of the most magnificent and expensive ever used in motion pictures. It is now being built at the Kalem Glendale (Cal.) Studios.

Mr. Siedle's experience as a designer of stage sets commenced forty years ago, when he joined the forces of the Drury Lane theater. He has been with the Metropolitan Opera Company for the last twenty-two years. Aside from his work as Technical Director for the foremost organization of its kind in the world, Mr. Siedle has designed most of the sets used in recent Broadway spectacles.

SUCCESSOR TO "NEPTUNE'S DAUGHTER."

Contracts have been executed between a syndicate of motion picture men and Captain Leslie T. Peacocke, author of "Neptune's Daughter," for a seven reel feature to be entitled "The Mermaid." Nell Shipman will be featured in the name part and will probably collaborate with Captain Peacocke on the scenario. Ernest Shipman and a party of interested persons left New York for Los Angeles on April 17 to complete arrangements with Miss Shipman. It is planned that the picture will be made in Bermuda amid the same scenes which were so effective in "Neptune's Daughter." Miss Shipman's accomplishments and personal charm are said to especially fit her for the part of mermaid in the proposed production.

Out on the West Coast

Blaisdell Sees California Photoplayers at Work and at Play—Many Interesting Happenings.

By the Moving Picture World Staff Correspondent.

Los Angeles, California.

FROM a condition of overextension, the exhibition of motion pictures in Los Angeles has reverted to one of normal, solid basis, is the opinion expressed by several exchangemen during the past week. The too common and equally unfounded belief that quick and sure money is bound to flow into the bank account of anyone opening a picture theater has been responsible for the launching of various exhibition enterprises in Los Angeles and its suburbs that have failed to withstand the competition these newcomers inaugurated.

Not so many months ago there were in this city and its immediate vicinity one hundred and forty picture theaters, according to a man in a position to know. Today there are ninety, he says. But, he adds, these ninety, or at least the great majority of them, are doing business at a profit. Possibly in this respect the exhibitors have the advantage of the average business man in Los Angeles. One resident merchant informed the writer that in his opinion seventy-five per cent. of the persons of means in this city were living on their principal. He added, however, that Los Angeles undoubtedly would derive a great benefit from the influx of visitors by reason of the fairs at San Francisco and San Diego; that very likely the southern California metropolis indirectly would receive more substantial returns from the expositions than would the communities in which they are situated.

A Visit to Inceville.

What a big film town this is, to be sure! The estimate here is that from seventy-five to eighty per cent. of the motion pictures produced in the United States are made in and about this southern California tourist center. When one scans the long list of studios and roughly sizes up their combined output, he is inclined to accept the estimate as not far from the fact. The manufacturers certainly have been at pains to remove themselves as far as possible from their fellows—except in a very few instances. Some of the establishments are in town and some of them are far out of it. One in the latter category and also one of the most picturesquely situated is Inceville, where Thomas Ince supervises Kay-Bee, Broncho and Domino productions for the New York Motion Picture Corporation. This great plant within the next two months will, in large part, be removed to Hollywood, the Los Angeles suburb famous as the home of picturemakers.

Inceville is about eighteen miles from the city's center. The last two miles are over a narrow and rather rough road along the ocean. Conveyed by Mr. Irvine in his car we left Santa Monica, coasted down the long and steep hill to the waterfront, passed through the quaint little fishing village inhabited by Russians at one end and by Japanese at the other, on by Suicide Canyon with its lone watchman delegated to interfere with the plans of would-be self-murderers and trespassers alike, and reached the closed gate of the big plant. We met Mr. Ince, who invited us to sit in on an inspection of a two-reel story featuring W. S. Hart. It is entitled "Bad Buck of Santa Ynez," with Mr. Hart in the name role. The subject abounds in rough and rapid riding and contains good drama. The little session was illuminative of the working of the directorial mind, as Mr. Ince indicated changes in the cutting designed to heighten the suspense and bring out the last bit of dramatic effect.

It was shortly afterward I met Mr. Hart. The man who has been so successful in the portrayal of western types was playing cards while waiting for his next scene. At his table as well as at the two others in the room all the men were in frontier garbs. It might well have been a rehearsal—the atmosphere was ideal. As Mr. Hart arose to greet the intruder, there was in his genial, smiling face not a trace of the cameolike hardness of feature which characterizes his remarkable interpretation of the bad man. The figure of the player is so perfectly proportioned that on the screen his height seems less than the actual—it must be well over the six-foot mark. Across the narrow mountainside road stood Fritz, the handsome sorrel ridden by Bad Buck. It was in the making of the picture we had just viewed that Fritz had nearly caused the death of his rider by making an unusually high bound when passing under a low-hanging tree limb. Mr. Hart's attention at the moment was divided by his concern for the safety of the rider of a bad horse.

On one of the stages Mr. Ince was watching the rehearsal of George Beban for the final scene in "The Sign of the Rose," which will take the screen at Clune's Auditorium when "The Clansman" is removed, and at the denouement of which the screen will be raised and the story finished by the players in person. The setting was of the flower shop. It is said that nearly fifty thousand feet of film were used in photographing the many scenes, which will be reduced to ten thousand.

Thomas Brierley showed us through the carpenter shops and property rooms. Mr. Brierley is supervising the building of one of the biggest and most elaborate sets of its kind ever used in pictures. It will be a representation of the United States Senate. The work is being done with infinite attention to detail and will be seen in completed form in "The Man from Oregon." Much of the gallery is already finished, as also, too, are many of the seventy desks which will come within the camera's range. These desks are worthy products of the cabinetmaker's art, and undoubtedly are superior to those found in many legislative halls. In the property rooms is a vast amount of costly furniture, protected by closely fitting duck coverings. Inceville, in great measure, has to depend on its own resources by reason of its distance from the commercial center. It well may.

Jay Hunt, old-time Screen Club pal, was busily at work directing a picture. Mr. Hunt, who has been directing for five years—that is the length of time he has been away from the speaking stage—has been with the company for two years. In the restaurant we met Manager Allen and Raymond B. West. In his office, too, we found Kenneth A. O'Hara, who keeps the world advised of the doings in this picturesque spot.

Inceville is a great place. Here the mountains meet the ocean. That's a combination that spells variety—yes, and charm, too.

On the return to Santa Monica we made a call at the Vitagraph plant and extended to Manager Smith the message sent across the continent by Sam Spedon. The Vitagraph's western players were all out on locations. We saw the little building in which the company's first Pacific coast pictures were made and noted the extension of the Santa Monica plant.

We made a call on John E. Brennan, who is preparing at the Pathe studio for his third release.

At Ocean Park we met up with Duane Wagar, proprietor, and F. L. Steinman, manager, of La Petite, a fine 500-seat theater showing General Film program and features. The music is furnished by a Wurlitzer organ. A factor of the house is the sharp gradient of the orchestra, making every chair a good one.

Static Club Banquet.

That's a fine progressive bunch of men in the Static Club of America, the coast organization of the cameramen. On March 23 the club gave a banquet, entertaining as guests manufacturers, directors, players and managers. It was a mighty lively time and a good one, too. William C. Foster and H. A. Scott were at the head of the entertainment committee, which overlooked no bets. The dinner was held in one of the large downtown restaurants, one side of which was occupied by the cameramen and their guests. The banqueters ignored the other diners, but by no means did the latter overlook them, enjoying to the full the material assistance given by the film folks to the cabaret entertainers. President Edward G. Ullman, Vice-President Billy Piltz, Secretary Allen Davey and Treasurer S. S. Norton head an outfit of which every member should be proud.

There was action from the start. Some one began "I Love You, California." It may have been one of the professional entertainers, but the whole party went to it. Carlyle Blackwell led a parade, and while it was on, the tables were deserted. Toward the end there were speeches. Charles Giblyn, for the directors and other guests, thanked the hosts and promised on behalf of his confreres a reciprocating entertainment. Jay Hunt said that in his experience in screen work he had never had the pleasure of participating in such a party. President Ullman, Carlyle Blackwell, William Foster and others spoke.

Among those present were: Isadore Bernstein, Dr. Lloyd R. Mace, Rex de Roselli, Frank Lloyd, David Horsley, Tom Mix, Kenneth A. O'Hara, Joseph H. August, T. B. Brown, R. V. Doeran, Otis M. Gove, Walter Edwards, Reginald Barker, Robert S. Newhard, Raymond B. West, Ira H. Morgan, Edward G. Ullman, R. D. Armstrong, the Rev. C. A.

Kimmons, S. S. Norton, "Captain Jack" Poland, A. J. Morrow, Frank D. Williams, H. P. Caulfield, A. B. Stafford, "Rube" Hanis, J. T. Brown, G. F. Schwedsalk, P. H. Whitman, J. B. Kenton, K. G. MacLean, Carlyle Blackwell, James A. Crosby, Thomas Chatterton, George Scott, J. D. Jennings, Jay Hunt, Homer A. Scott, Henry Kernan, Frank Biggy, Al. E. Christie, William J. Piltz, Park J. Ries, R. Lyman Broening, Joe Waddell, Fred Le Roy Granville, Charles G. Rosher, Earnie J. Sherman, R. A. Roberts, Fred W. Hormby, H. E. Butler, R. F. Overbaugh, V. L. Fleming, L. A. Allen and Harry Gersted.

Photoplayers' Dinner.

The following evening the Photoplayers held their regular weekly fellowship dinner at their fine clubhouse in South Hill street.

Eugene Pallette was director-in-chief, and he started the ball rolling with the first course of the excellent turkey dinner cooked in the kitchen of the club. President Dell Henderson and Vice-President William Taylor were on each side of the toastmaster. The event of the evening was the address by Al. Jennings, the man with a past, who claimed the right to a future—and proved his contention by winning it. It will be recalled that Mr. Jennings recently appeared before the camera in "Beating Back," the story of which was based on his own life. In his talk Mr. Jennings recounted some of the events of his career. He did not spare himself—neither did he spare others.

There can be no gainsaying the fact that Al. Jennings is a remarkable man. He is a speaker of power. He has keen wit, a delivery that is all the more impressive by its straightforwardness, its frankness and its direct appeal to the hearer's sense of justice. His voice is raised just so high as may reach the last auditor. It is well modulated. The former "lifer" is the antithesis of the bad man as we are taught by those fiction writers and stage producers to believe him. He is short of stature and even of temper. He is magnetic, a natural leader. Not a bit of the drama in the story he unfolded was lost on the players and directors who with rapt attention followed him—from his birth in a fence corner in Virginia as his mother was fleeing from an invading army; how at fourteen years of age he was a fully grown man and knew no law but the blue barrel of a "forty-five." Mr. Jennings knows his Bible and its parables, and he knows, too, how most effectively to use them.

The speaker was given an ovation when he finished. Others who were heard from in song or story or talk were Dick Cummings, Charles Mailes, Hirshall Mayall, Chet Withey, Harry Gribben, Al. Filson, Dick Willis, John Sheehan, Elmer Redmond, Mr. Pallette, the father of the toastmaster; Jack Dillon and Eddie Dillon.

The weekly dinner of the Photoplayers has been one of the features of the club since its organization.

Los Angeles Exchanges.

The other day I called on M. H. Lewis, manager of the Progressive Motion Picture Company, which in southern California, Arizona and New Mexico distributes the Paramount program. The Progressive was established by William W. Hodkinson. Mr. Lewis said that business was improving, although local conditions were not of the best. The Lenten season and the spell of warm weather had tended to militate against the exhibitor somewhat. The Progressive was the first exchange to release pictures for an entire week's run. Mr. Lewis urges on his customers the advantage of showing subjects for two or more days. "The real feature is always in demand," said the manager, "but the public is losing patience with subjects that have nothing to recommend them but length. Furthermore, the pictures which are advertised as features and which are not make it bad for the genuine article."

The Progressive has used up four prints of "Les Miserables," the great dramatization by Pathe of Hugo's work. To prove the long life of a great subject, Mr. Lewis pointed out that "Les Miserables" is still being exhibited, as it has been for going on two years, at prices of 25 and 50 cents. Altogether it has been shown eighteen weeks in Los Angeles.

The California Kriterion Film Exchange is one of the newest of the distributing agencies in Los Angeles, having started business on March 15. Arthur Bard, the manager, says his opening was most auspicious, in that every exhibitor who contracted for the first week's service remained on for the second, which he construes as the best evidence of satisfaction. He said he had business waiting for an increase in the stock of film—"in other words," he said, "and it is amusing, we have a waiting list." The offices are well furnished and contain in the rear a good projection room. The territory supplied by the exchange includes southern California, New Mexico and Arizona.

Mr. Bard, who has long been in the local film field, says he is making it a point to give exhibitors just the sort of service they want, whether it be one reel a day or a full program. Mr. Bard pointed out that what oftentimes by a downtown exhibitor would be considered a good program would by the proprietor of a theater in a residential district be repudiated. Subjects in demand for one class of house would be impossible in another. Assisting Mr. Bard are Harry Jacobs, an old-time film man; S. MacIntyre, owner of the Photoplay, at Thirtieth and Vermont streets, and Francis J. Hawkins, formerly owner of the Alhambra.

J. W. Allen, manager of the California Film Exchange, was feeling particularly good when the World man called on him. He said he had just landed for the Universal program the new 750-seated Symphony Theater. Asked if he did not think his business had been helped by the large amount of local publicity attending the opening of Universal City, Mr. Allen said undoubtedly this was true. He added that his office was better equipped than ever before to handle increased business.

BLAISDELL.

CARROL NEARLY CARVED.

Frank Carrol, the picture man, had, up till the evening of the Willard-Johnson fight, a colored servant, Edward. Much booze, the excitement, suspense and final disappointment in the result of the Havana encounter were too much for the darkie butler. He came back in an ugly frame of mind and with a great desire to kill some white man. Mr. Carrol, his employer, happened to be the nearest, and when Edward had secured the carving knife in the pantry he gave him his attention. He got him pressed against the dining-room table and was telling him how he intended cutting him up and how it happened that he needed to cut up some white man. Mr. Carrol had the presence of mind not to struggle. In the meanwhile, a crowd was gathering just outside the open window, held spellbound by the terrible sight. Tiko, Mr. Carrol's terrier, had been barking nervously about, made a spring for the wrist of the colored man and made him drop the knife. Before he could recover it, an officer from the One Hundred and First street station house appeared, and after a fierce struggle took the crazy man into custody.

STEVENSON TAKES VACATION.

George Universal Stevenson, editor of the Trans-Atlantic Weekly, the English edition of the Universal Weekly, published in London, writes from Madrid, Spain, under date of March 25, to the effect that he is taking a vacation to recuperate from illness caused by overwork. George says that hard work boosting the "Trey of Hearts" put him on his back for a week and the doctor ordered him south to thaw out. He said that he proposed to see a lot of Spain and Morocco and get back to his desk about Easter time. He is probably back at his desk by this time.

Mr. McCray joined the Universal western forces two years ago, when the Big U coast players occupied the old studio across the street from the Hollywood plant which in turn has now passed into history.

"The Destroyer"

A Kalem Three-Reel Offering that Gives New Life to an Old Story—It Is Imaginative, Truthful and Sincere.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THIS is the kind of picture or at least the kind of production that critics have been asking for. The outline of the story has been given in many other films; but here it is made new and deep by sincere imaginative treatment. It works out the old triangle with the contrasted types, a good and a vile woman, and with a poor, weak, pup of a young man between them, with situations unexpectedly fresh and truthful, coming up all through it. It is a three-reel offering, called "The Destroyer," but it is so much "a bit of life" and has so many angles from which it might be viewed that many good titles could be found for it. It doesn't weakly take sides; isn't partial to the pretty heroine and has no sloppy story to tell nor does it try to coax our tears. It is as hard-muscled as an Indian or an Arab. The trouble with all good art is—and we might cite many glorious shades to corroborate this—that it tells the truth, and the truth is apt to have an acrid taste—the picture is a bit painful. If all our popular pictures were as true, as carefully and competently made as this is, we would be a race of mental giants. If we found the truth always pleasant, how we could solve the problems of the time! The producer is Robert G. Vignola and the author is Hamilton Smith, and whether or not more credit is due to one or the other, we don't know. They had a strong cast of players.

Alice Hollister has the role of the "Destroyer," an actress with a "fascination" who weaves her web, like a disgusting spider, around a "pup" man (Harry Millarde); gets him away from his sweetheart (Anna Nillson) and ruins him completely. Slowly but surely the thing is evolved before us and the characters of the "destroyer" and the "pup" are turned inside out. Miss Hollister is worth seeing in this part. She is certainly not pretty, but she shows imagination and makes us thoroughly believe in her. Every one of the players who support her do satisfactory work. Miss Nillson is charming. Harry Millarde is what he wants to seem and the artist who introduced him to the actress and the two fathers are fine.

There is a specially interesting scene where the actress finally "prys" the young lovers apart. Another good bit of directing is where the actress is left by her sleepy maid to bring her real lover and the boy together in her apartment—it is all, including the "call down," as true as can be. The last group of scenes is relentless. The picture's fingers do not weaken from the throat of its theme till the story is done and the picture fades away into a bright spot on the wall. It is a healthy, vigorous picture.

Mechanically, the offering is up to Kalem standard and we don't need to say anything more.

"Captain Courtesy"

Dustin Farnum in the Title Role of a Notable Five-Reel Romance of Early California, Produced by Bosworth, Inc.

EDWARD CHILDS CARPENTER is the author of "Captain Courtesy," the five-reel romance of California in 1840, when that state was still under the domination of the Mexicans, which the Bosworth Company produced recently. The leading role has been intrusted to Dustin Farnum, and everything connected with the photoplay is the outcome of intelligent liberality, artistic perception, and a resolve to be satisfied with nothing but the best results obtainable. Photographically, the picture takes high honors, the many striking scenes offered by the place and the period having been utilized to the uttermost.

The story has a Robert Louis Stevenson suggestion, with its atmosphere of fighting, hair breadth escapes, daring horsemanship, and vigorous incidents throughout. "Captain Courtesy" is the title assumed by Leonardo Davis, a young American settler, whose father and mother have been murdered by a renegade fellow countryman in the pay of the Mexicans. In order to avenge his parents and help the cause of the American settlers, young Davis becomes a highwayman and robs his enemies, only to hand the booty over to his own compatriots. An orphan girl, the ward of Father Reinaldo, also figures prominently in the tale. The scenes in and about the old San Fernando Mission, where the Americans are besieged until rescued by a company of riflemen under Kearny, and where "Captain Courtesy" performs many deeds of valor, are not authentic, but among the most impressive ever shown upon the screen. The interior of the Mission, with its inlaid floor, massive doors, and ancient stairway, is particularly striking.

As the dashing highwayman Dustin Farnum has a character to which he is fitted mentally and physically. His romantic bearing, easy command of the actor's art, and superb horsemanship, are all brought into constant use; he also gives the entire performance its cue for rapid action and brilliant effort. Herbert Standing as the lovable old priest, Father Reinaldo, seems a replica of the man whom he impersonates; and Winnifred Kingston makes Eleanor, the padre's ward, the very embodiment of appealing girlhood. Courtenay Foote plays the renegade in the intensely melodramatic manner befitting villains of Granville's uncompromising type.

"Captain Courtesy" is an achievement of which the Bosworth Company may well be proud, and it will unquestionably receive a cordial welcome from all patrons of the photoplay.

"Who's Who In Society."

A Mirthful Comedy in Four Parts by George Kleine, with Dan Moyles, Della Connor and Kate Sergeantson in the Principal Roles.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

IF YOU want an hour of live, rollicking fun, interspersed here and there with suppressed chuckles of gleeful mirth, don't fail to see George Kleine's comedy, "Who's Who in Society," which has just been done in films by his excellent New York company.

The story has to do with a newly rich family, the maternal head of which is obsessed by the desire to break into the hallowed circle of the "400," and whose experiences, added to slips of the tongue that would grace a Mrs. Malaprops or a Mrs. Partington, keep one in throes of laughter or of suspense while the screen presentation lasts. The strong contrast betwen the titular head of the house and his scheming, ambitious spouse gives sparkle to the current of the humor, and this is further heightened by their gurgling, young, romping daughter, who is akin to her father in temperament.

Our old friend, Dan Moyles, as the Mr. O'Brien of the story, gives a characterization that will always fix him in the memory of those who delight to view him in photo-comedy, and that means a legion. To me it is as perfect as art and experience can make it. His fine, expressive countenance mirrors faithfully the whims and thoughts that seize him, while the rich drollery of his manner keeps perfect accompaniment. The spats between Mr. and Mrs. O'Brien are brimful of mirth, as revealed by Miss Sergeantson and Mr. Moyles. When the invitations sent out to prominent members of the "400" are scornfully returned to Mrs. O'Brien, what more natural than that she should hold her good-natured husband responsible for the slights, because he frequented Casey's saloon instead of getting soused like a gentleman at his club?

Equal praise is due Miss Sergeantson for her finished portrayal of Mrs. O'Brien, the would-be bounder. Her gracious reception of the crook, who gains access to her home by passing himself as Lord Algernon St. Clair, is a scream. That subtitle, "Lord, please look after Marie, she's so unsophisticated," when Mrs. O'Brien desires the bogus nobleman to pay attention to her daughter, Mary Ellen, accentuates the grim humor of the situation.

Pretty Della Connor takes off hoydenish Mary Ellen with natural grace and charm, and Edward Lester gives a fine impersonation of the bogus Lord Algy. The stranger in the story and the Jap butler are also well sustained.

I nearly overlooked to direct attention to the members of the Flannagan family, who attended the soiree given in honor of Mary Ellen's birthday. They furnish one of the richest comedy treats in the filmed story. The part of Mrs. Flannagan is so refreshingly Milesian that one laughs until the tears come. Then the boy and girl of the family, who have a desire to cling to the neck of the haughty Mrs. O'Brien, they simply put one's laughing apparatus out of business! Nor must we slight Mr. Flannagan, the man with the retrousse nose who plays the pianner, while his good wife sings old Irish ditties to the complete mortification of their hostess. This is one of the best drawn character bits in the cast.

Mrs. O'Brien invites the Van Dusens and the Astorbilts to a soiree at her home in honor of her only daughter's birthday. One of them, in reply, regrets her inability to attend, as she is quite sure she has not the honor of knowing Mrs. O'Brien.

On the day of the soiree an automobile breaks down in front of the O'Brien residence, and the owner, Lord Algy, requests the hospitality of the house. Mrs. O'Brien, much to the disgust of her husband, receives him, and at once begins to plan the marriage of Mary Ellen (her daughter) to her distinguished guest.

That night, before retiring, Mrs. O'Brien places valuable jewelry in the hands of her husband for safekeeping. He is about to put them away when he is robbed by the false Lord Algy, who, through the intervention of a detective, is arrested. The expose horrifies Mrs. O'Brien and nerves Mr. O'Brien to seize the reins of the household. As the fade out comes we see Mrs. O'Brien throwing the book, "Who's Who in Society," into the wastebasket.

"Where Can I Get a Wife?"

One of the "Dudley" Series of Comedies Being Released Under the Cameo Brand, and Appearing on the Program of the United Film Service.

Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald.

WHEN Dan Mason and Harry Kelly join forces on the comedy field there is bound to be something doing, a fact that is easily demonstrated in the comedies now being released under the Cameo brand through the United Film Service. These comedies, known as the "Dudley" series, are in quality some of the best that are on the market, partly from the fact that the members of the casts are chosen from among competent players, and partly from the fact that the comedies themselves are being produced under efficient direction.

The theme of "Where Can I Get a Wife?" is almost as old, and perhaps older, than the moving picture itself; but the story has been handled in such a tactful manner that we enjoy the result quite as much as though the picture had its foundation on something new and original. The business of the picture, with possibly one or two exceptions, is good; and there is a successful attempt at the artistic in photography, lighting, sets, etc.

The story of the picture is of a young man who has strayed away from his family in England, and is spending most of his time in high living. One day he gets a letter from his father (Dan Mason), which tells him that if he will marry his allowance will be tripled. He immediately replies with a telegram stating that he has been married on a certain day. The unexpected happens, of course, and the old man takes a trip from England to see his new daughter-in-law. One of the boys "Dudley" (Harry Kelly), of course, impersonates the wife. The result is very funny and, as before stated, the comedy (the third of the series), with its predecessors can take its place among the really enjoyable present-day comedies.

Paramount Cameramen Quarantined.

While enroute for South America to secure pictures for the Travel Series to be released shortly by the Paramount Picture Corporation, the cameramen were held up by being forced to go to Jamaica in order to avoid the quarantine. The trip as originally planned was to include a short stay in Florida, Key West and Havana and from there the party was to proceed across the Isthmus and down the West Coast of South America. The party finally got off for Key West and thence to Havana. On reaching this port, the Paramount party decided to go to Colon without landing since Havana was under quarantine for an epidemic of bubonic plague. On reaching Colon they found the same condition of affairs prevailed and as the boat was going on to Jamaica the main party went on, leaving one man in Colon. The party will endeavor to proceed through Columbia to Guayaquill as soon as they can proceed from Jamaica. The man they left in Colon will proceed along the same route after spending two weeks in quarantine.

Mong Succeeds Gebhart.

William V. Mong, who entered into contract with the Pike's Peak Company several weeks ago, has succeeded George Gebhart as assistant manager of the Western company's studios.

Immediately on Mr. Mong's arrival at the Garden of the Gods' studio several weeks ago, he took charge of the company's scenario department and began writing two-reel Westerns. His first picture will be released by the United under the "Lariat" brand on April 10, under the title "The Cost." George Gebhart, Edwin Cobb, Josephine West and Mr. Mong will play the leading parts.

"The Clemenceau Case."

The first appeal of Herbert Brenon's production of Alexander Duma's "The Clemenceau Case" is in sensuous passages acted in a provocative manner by Theda Bara. No more than the law requires is left to the imagination. The picture is artistically produced and occasionally interesting, although it seems unnecessarily long. Many of the scenes might be cut without harming the story and the danger of an audience growing restless would be appreciably lessened. William Shay and Stuart Holmes are the chief players in support of Miss Bara.

seeing. It has a remarkable way of fascinating the spectator right at the very outset and maintaining it without digression.

If it is the first chapter which decides the fate of the detective story and if the analogy holds good for the detective story of the screen, then "The Road o' Strife" will be a very popular film. In a jiffy we are thrown into the midst of a mystery. Every move is clear before us; a child can follow the story as far as it goes. Nevertheless the mystification is complete, we wonder what it all can possibly lead to, our sympathy wakens with our interest and before we realize it the thousand feet of film have passed, leaving us eager for the "To be continued in our next."

The second instalment continues to rivet our interest; we are now better acquainted with the characters; we have begun to love some, to detest others and to be in doubt about the rest. Some of the double exposure work in the second reel is wonderfully effective. The cast is an exceptionally strong one, and it is evident that every member of it is thoroughly in love with his or her part; a circumstance which always tends toward success and perfection.

Frohman Film in Social Service.

The Church and School Social Service Bureau, of which the Rev. Dr. William Carter is the head, has obtained the privilege of using the Frohman Amusement Corporation's screen presentation of "The Fairy and the Waif" in the service to churches and schools which the bureau is establishing. This privilege was granted after Dr. Carter and Dr. Charles Parkhurst had made a call on Lewis J. Selznick and Gustave Frohman and had expressed a desire to show the picture to some of the audiences which might not see the film in the regular motion picture theaters. They both remarked that the film was so clean and beautiful in its conception and makeup as to be worthy of a showing in houses of worship and schools. The visit of Dr. Carter and Dr. Parkhurst was the result of an exhibition of the film before a committee for the Bureau composed of Hamilton Holt, editor of The Independent, Anne Morgan, Elizabeth Marbury, Dr. Carter and Dr. Parkhurst.

The first showing of the picture under the auspices of the Social Service Bureau was at Sing Sing last Sunday. It was shown again in a Boston church on Monday evening and in the Church of the Saviour at 111th street and Lexington avenue, New York, on Tuesday evening. Dr. Carter expressed his opinion that "The Fairy and the Waif" comes as near to being the perfect screen story as any he has had the privilege of seeing.

Famous Vaudeville Team in Kleine's "Commuters."

In addition to an expensive and very unusual cast for his "Commuters," George Kleine engaged the famous vaudeville team of Crimmens & Gore. This information was gleaned at an advance showing of the subject at the Kleine studios, where the well known vaudeville team was recognized in its familiar make-up and much of its familiar "business." Irene Fenwick, present star of "The Song of Songs," at the Eltinge theater, plays the lead of Hetty Brice, Charles Judels, who played the Italian in "Twin Beds," handles the funny role of "Sammy"; while George Le Guere plays Larry Brice, the commuter.

"The Commuters" will be released through the various Kleine offices April 26.

"Enoch Arden"

A Four-Reel Majestic of Great Beauty and Poetic Charm.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THE story of "Enoch Arden," as visualized by William Christy Cabanne, is a splendid composite of imagery and illustration, just what the distinguished poet intended it should be. The very simplicity of the story is artfully preserved. That simplicity, however, is not in atmosphere, feeling and humanity. In its avoidance of sensation and false sentiment, it is all the more impressive and more in accord with the author's own mood when he wrote it. The pictured version, in fact, becomes a formidable rival to the poem, instead of a poor and inadequate reflection, as are most transformations from literature to the screen.

Because of its background it is manifestly impossible to present this story of other days without resort to studio costumes and settings, but these do not jar by their artificiality. They are overlooked because of the evident sincerity of the producer. He has taken infinite pains in the small details of household equipment, and has even attempted, though less successfully, to "plant" a tropical island. Mr. Cabanne has made an effort that deserves high praise because he has absorbed his subject and given to it the soul and feeling of a genuine artist.

A strong factor in the success of "Enoch Arden" as offered by the Majestic Company is Lillian Gish as Annie Lee. I feared at the outset that she could not respond to the exactions of the role, but she gathers strength as the story goes on, and her slight figure gradually becomes the center of sympathetic attention. She has caught the idea of mental revelation without effort—her face is very expressive—but she still adheres to a painful eccentricity of Griffith's pupils, that of bent elbows and clutching hands. What is done with hands and arms depends entirely upon the character to be depicted, and to repeat a peculiarity under all circumstances gives a sameness to characterization.

Miss Lillian is admirably supported by Alfred Paget and Wallace Reid. Both men act with convincing sincerity and dignity. These three fine interpreters complete and round out what I have already designated "a splendid composite of imagery and illustration."

Motion Picture in Political Fight.

Cincinnati, Ohio, has just had a traction franchise fight and Robert Warwick in "The Man of the Hour" helped to turn the scale in favor of the people. The story of "The Man of the Hour," in which Robert Warwick is starred, relates how the young mayor of New York, who is the hero of the photo-drama, defies the bosses, who wanted him to grant them a traction franchise. He refused to sign the bill, threatening to veto it if passed. Cincinnati was confronted with a similar crisis. The bosses there wanted a franchise bill passed, and the people were opposed to it.

"The Man of the Hour" was shown at the height of the agitation at the Avondale Theater, Cincinnati. The audience cheered and applauded the culmination of the photo-drama, which showed the defeat of boss politics as applied to a traction franchise. The effect of the moral of "The Man of the Hour" made itself felt in the Cincinnati election, which resulted in the defeat of the bosses.

to the exploits of the remarkable heroine of the series has been more thrillingly interesting. Wu Fang having lost his hold on the ring and Elaine having had the ill fortune to have bought the curious bit of jewelry from a Chinese broker, again comes near her death. But nearer still to the "Great Divide" comes her lover, Craig Kennedy, who partakes of the poison—aconite—dropped in a dish of ice cream by Wu Fang. An antidote administered just in the nick of time brings him around, and enables him to accept an unwarranted number of bumps in the hotel of Wu Fang, where Elaine is lured by the Chinaman in hopes of gaining possession of the ring.

The fight and chase in the hotel, and over the roofs of houses has been well managed, and supplies all the "thrill" that any audience could wish for. It is, indeed, remarkable to note the apparently limitless number of startling ideas that are continually being worked into this series.

Robert Warwick in "A Celebrated Case."

Robert Warwick, in addition to working at the studio, is now appearing in the Charles Frohman-David Belasco all-star revival of "A Celebrated Case" at the Empire theater, New York. The next World Film feature in which he will appear will be "The Face in the Moonlight." The leading feminine role will be handled by Miss Jessie Lewis, who played the ingenue role with Wilton Lackaye in "The Pit." H. Cooper Cliffe, known through his portrayal of "Nobody" in "Every Woman," has just finished working in the William Elliott photoplay, "Woman and Wine." Montague Love will again appear as a villain in the support of Clara Kimball Young in "Hearts in Exile." He is also at present in a Broadway production appearing at the Garrick theater with Arnold Daly in George Shaw's "You Never Can Tell."

In the cast of "The Builder of Bridges," the newest Frohman Amusement Company's release, which is to be seen on the World Film schedule in June, the following noted players will be seen: C. Aubrey Smith, who is now appearing opposite Margaret Illington in "The Lie," at the Harris theater, New York; Marie Edith Wells, a beautiful woman with stage experience; Mrs. Kate Meek, whose work with various Charles Frohman productions, is still fresh in the memory, and Jack Boynton Sherrill. George Irving, who directed the making of "The Fairy and the Waif," has the work on "The Builder of Bridges" well under way. Recently the entire company spent a week taking exteriors at Atlantic City.

Mr. Rifkin's firm is the New England representative of the Alliance Films Corporation and he reports that he is getting his share of business in this territory. Through Mr. Rifkin's untiring efforts the Alliance Program is now being used in nearly all of the highest class houses down East. The Strand, in Hartford, and the theaters on the Poli Circuit are regular subscribers.

First Appearance of New Star.

Miss Neva Gerber will make her first appearance as leading lady of the "Beauty" Company in the production from the American Studios, under the title "Life's Staircase." This picture will be partly allegorical and contain many splendid effects in double and triple exposures in which the American Studios excel. Director Cooley has had a specially constructed staircase erected for this production and other careful detail in stage setting has been complied with to make a perfect film.

Norman Hackett in Pictures.

Norman Hackett, the well known actor, who has starred in "Strongheart" and numerous other plays and been associated with Louis James and Frederick Warde in Shakespearian productions, has been engaged to create the leading role in a screen version of Mrs. Eunice Colburn's story, "Yermak, the Dorado," which is to be brought out this summer by the United Photoplay Company, of Chicago. The character to be played by Mr. Hackett is supposed to have belonged to a lost race, and many of the scenes are laid in the Yosemite Valley.

Viola Allen in "The White Sister."

Viola Allen, who will soon make her debut in photoplays, after years of success on the legitimate stage, playing leading classical, Shakespearian and comedy roles. Her first photoplay will be "The White Sister," dramatized from the novel by F. Marion Crawford, in which she made such a signal success on the speaking stage. The production shortly will be released by Essanay.

Charlotte Ives Appearing Before Camera.

Charlotte Ives, for many years with Charles Frohman productions, more recently with Lew Fields in "The High Cost of Loving," has been playing leads for World Comedy-Star pictures in Chicago.

"A Romance of the Navy"

A Fine Story of Gallantry and Patriotism Set in Superb Surroundings.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

OF ALL the stories of either navy or army ever filmed here or abroad, few have approached this Lubin production in the genuineness of its atmosphere. The plot of the story may not rise above that of other similar stories with a melodramatic flavor, but the atmosphere is unique and realistic to the last degree. I do not know what it has cost to film this story, but I do know that money must have been spent lavishly to secure these wonderful and charming scenes of Newport with its training school and war college and the equally wonderful and equally charming scenes of the Naval Academy at Annapolis.

Nor must it be supposed that the producer has merely contented himself with showing views of Newport and Annapolis. He has done far more than this. He has shown us the navy in action, the blue jackets at exercise and the budding Farraguts at their swift maneuvers. He has likewise succeeded in fitting these scenes very snugly into his story. The story by the way never lags in the telling, it fairly abounds in exciting incidents, it is rich in appeals to patriotism and its final climax lifts it out of the melodrama of the common or garden variety.

Charming and stirring as the scenes of Annapolis are, the views of Newport and her beauty by sea and land have probably never been surpassed on any screen.

"A Romance of the Navy" is a virile, beautiful and patriotic play, which, I think, will be much sought after by exhibitors once its fame begins to spread among motion picture audiences.

but little of satire, but a good deal of rather lively and boisterous humor, often approaching and even entering the domain of farce. The abilities of Victor Moore as a fun-maker will be conceded by all who see the picture.

The plot—what there is of it—is largely farcical and highly improbable. At times there is merely a string of laughable scenes held together by threads thinner than gossamer. The audience, however, is never disposed to be critical after it recognizes the burlesque character of the whole thing. The scenes in the hotel where the "Dook" awakens to the importance of his rank and begins to decorate and almost tattoo himself with the heraldic emblem of the ducal house are bound to send even a frigid audience into titters.

The pathos of the love story is rather pretty and always entertaining. It is just to mention the horse that pulled the milk wagon; it surely is a funny quadruped. The settings were fully up to the enviable standard of the Lasky productions, likewise the photography. The titles deserve special praise; bits of brilliant and witty dialog having been inserted just at the exact psychological moment. "Snobs" is altogether a creditable picture.

"With Bridges Burned"

Three-Reel Edison Revival of the Story by Rex Beach.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

A STRONG photodrama of admirable construction and adequate treatment, "With Bridges Burned," is sure to win, because it contains an abundance of elemental truth in the propulsion of events and in the significance of its characterization. Of still higher importance than character and action is the subject matter. The story deals primarily with the plucky struggle of a young couple against what appears to be overwhelming odds, and the author does not take the easiest way to extricate them from the difficulties of their undertaking. He brings them into a clash with adverse circumstances from the outset and carries them through a series of positive events, fighting every inch of the way for release from the disadvantages of poverty, measuring their pluck and persistency against greed and graft, to a culmination that is earned.

That is one splendid method of narrating a vital story. Augustus Phillips, as the salesman of a firm of steel contractors, finds himself suddenly deprived of a lucrative position through no fault of his own. He is laid off because of an unexpected depression in business, and he is loath to make connections outside of the line he understands. His plucky young wife, portrayed by Mabel Trunelle, comes to his rescue with a thousand dollars given to her as a marriage portion. He objects to using all that stands between them and abject poverty in a venture, but she suggests that they stake all on obtaining an enormous contract to be allotted by a London construction company for work in South Africa, and her courage finally prevails.

Phillips has difficulty in prevailing on the concern he has represented to accord him credentials, but he persists until they permit him to go ahead at his own expense, and he sails for London with barely enough money to tide him over until the period for assigning the contract. His experiences there are full of significance. He encounters the corrupt opposition of wealthy competitors and attempts to attain his end by untiring industry and no little native skill. The fearful struggle, as depicted by Phillips in his single-handed effort is strikingly realistic, perhaps the best thing he has ever done on the screen. The intensity of his situation is constantly augmented by a correspondingly intense effort to do the work of a half dozen men while, at the same time, meeting the smooth dissimulation of crooked employees and corrupting competitors.

Desperate and overworked, he is at last on the verge of success, when the expedient of changing the hands of a clock is used to overwhelm him. He is completely overcome by this blow, but among the mutually foiling personalities is an office boy, who, all unknown to the young American, puts the bid into the hands of the London constructors, and a successful issue comes about when it is least expected, when it has become regarded as impossible. The story is truly dramatic and it contains that most important secret of success, that which holds the attention of the audience to the last, a well-devised line of suspense.

"The Fifth Commandment"

Julius Steger in a Five-Part Photoplay of His Former Success—Produced by the World Film Corporation.

Reviewed by Edward Weitzel.

"THE FIFTH COMMANDMENT," which served Julius Steger so long and with such admirable results during his career on the spoken stage, has been transferred to the screen by the World Film Corporation with equal success, Mr. Steger appearing in his old part of Carl Winters, the musician. Five reels are utilized in unfolding the film version, which opens with the meeting between Carl and Alice Winthrop at the New York College of Music, shows the growing intimacy between the two, which ripens into love and leads to Carl's dismissal from his position. Finding that the wealthy father of Alice does not approve of him, the musician, who has accepted the directorship of a musical academy in Rio de Janeiro, proposes that they be married immediately. Alice agrees, and Carl leaves for his new post, with the understanding that his wife will follow him later.

In the meantime, Alice is persuaded to return to her father's house. She dies here, after giving birth to a daughter. The news of her death almost unseats Winters' reason. A serious illness follows, and he leaves the hospital broken in health, his ambition gone, without knowing of the birth of his child.

Years later, when this child has almost reached womanhood and Winters has sunk to singing in the streets, the two meet. The union between father and daughter is finally brought about by the girl's grandfather relenting and doing tardy justice to the wronged and suffering musician.

This appealing tale, without subplot and never deviating from its one theme, offers excellent material for a photoplay, the strong human interest underlying it making even its simplest incident of value. Subtle complications of plot, ingenious and unexpected turns of construction, are not needed in this drama. It tells its story in an elementary but impressive manner, and deals only with the better things of life.

Mr. Steger has made the character of the wronged man his own, and his many years of playing it has given him ease and authority. This is forcibly shown upon the screen. Forrest Robinson plays the banker with his usual effective method. Kathryn Brown Decker, Edith Thornton, Alberta Gallatin, Hal Clarendon, Giovanni, and Grace Reals are also substantial props in Mr. Steger's support.

"The Corsican Brothers"

Universal Features King Baggot in Three-Reel Modernized Version of Alexandre Dumas' Famous Novel.

Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald.

FOLLOWING up a present-day practice among film producers, namely, the modernizing of stories which were originally set by their authors in a period more or less remote from our own, the Universal version of the Dumas novel, adapted and produced by George Lessey, brings to our vision the Paris of to-day, with a Corsica that might have belonged in part to the period referred to by the novelist.

The production has, however, lost little if any by the transposition of its story to the modern atmosphere. King Baggot playing a dual role, does remarkably well with the characters of the twin brothers, Louis and Fabien de Franchi. There is, of course, as always in such cases, a noticeable lack of freedom in action on the double exposure scenes, which, it must be admitted, is so slight in the present instance, as to be scarcely worth a comment. What are given the most realistic treatment of any of the picture's scenes are the dual scenes, where Louis is killed by the villain Renard (Hal Clarendon) and where Fabien avenges his brother's death.

The strongly dramatic situations of the story have been handled well, and the settings of the production and effects gained through efficient camera work are points worthy of special comment.

Jane Gail plays the role of Emily De Esparrde with good effect, Ned Reardon appears as Meynard, making that rather minor role stand well forward as regards artistic interpretation, and Frank Smith plays the role of Montgerion in his usually finished manner. The "heavy" is taken care of by Hal Clarendon, who is generally recognized to be one of the most finished villains in the moving picture business.

The production cannot fail to please, regardless of the fact that the modernizing of the story may not please all of us.

Conness Unappreciated Courtesy.

Robert Conness, Edison, tells the following story of how too much sympathy in a certain part is not always productive of appreciation. He had found, on his way home late one night, a man who might be a respectable citizen had he not chosen to fall asleep on the curb and very careless as to his address, and, feeling sorry for him, found out where he lived after much questioning. Conness called a taxi-cab and after dragging the man up the steps of his home was asked, "Shay, you're a pretty decent fellow. Where do you live?" "In Jersey," answered the good samaritan. "Well," was the befuddled reply, "If yer from Jersey, you ain't much."

The next wayside slumberer will probably continue to repose on his concrete couch, so far as the Edison man is concerned.

"Adventures of Rafferty"

Rafferty Settles the War in a One-Reel All-Celtic Film Offering.

By Hanford C. Judson.

THIS is a new idea of the All-Celtic Film Company, and it appeals to us, in spite of the fact that the first installment is not of high entertainment value, on account of its lack of compelling humor and of convincing humanity. It pictures how Rafferty settled the European war, not as a story, but as a sort of Dooley-like running discussion. Rafferty is a great peace advocate and dreams that he is President. There is incident in it and it would go all right if this flow of incident were fresh, convincing and humorous. We await the other releases of this series with considerable expectation. They may turn out to be the hit of the season if they embody a really good scenario and are acted with more sense of real human character.

"Pawns of Mars"

Vitagraph Drama in Three Reels Shows How Explosives May Be Used in Warfare.

THE Vitagraph Company is careful to assert its neutrality in a title at the opening of "Pawns of Mars," a three-part war melodrama, written by Donald I. Buchanan and directed by Theodore Marston. The characters and countries are said to be mythical and the production is still further justified by being termed "a drama of war that speaks for peace." As a matter of fact, there is no visible motive behind the story, other than that of offering rather exciting entertainment; but it sounds well to call depictions of war pleas for peace, and it does no harm.

The soldiers and scientists of the imaginary kingdoms of Cosmotania and Mapadonia are quite a bit in advance of their destructive brethren in Europe. Their knowledge of bombs to be exploded on land or sea is extraordinary. The effectiveness of the explosives is far greater than that of the armies of the warring nations and the plot is mainly concerned with efforts to corner the bomb market. Then a young engineer goes the maker of the bombs one better by inventing an instrument which shoots waves of electricity through the air and discharges the bombs. They explode harmlessly, like rockets. Presently he aims the electric waves at the aeroplane carrying his enemy above the heads of the soldiers and the machine is brought to earth, a mass of burning wreckage. Fighting against electricity is too much for the Cosmotanians and soon peace is declared.

Supplementing the military intrigues running through this picture is a romance of some interest in which the daughter of the inventor of the bombs appears to vacillate between her accepted sweetheart and the young spy who is sent to discover the secrets of her countrymen. The role of the girl is given a sympathetic interpretation by Dorothy Kelly and in other important parts, James Morrison, George Cooper and Charles Kent act with commendable sincerity. The spectacular quality of many of the scenes and the interest aroused by a very well presented story should make "Pawns of Mars" a popular offering.

"The Beginning at the End"

Two-Reel Ideal of Unusual Development Appearing on the Program of the United Film Service.

THE rather unusual character of the title of this picture is the first thing about it to attract attention, the significance of which is somewhat profound, we discover upon further investigation.

The production is one of exceptional quality, with a moral truth placed foremost. The theme of the story has been tactfully handled by a director and players who know their business. Playing the male lead in a role which presents a young man who has drunk life to its dregs, and in bitter contemplation of his sins is about to commit suicide, is George Larkin. In the feminine roles are Dolly Larkin and Ethel Lehr, both of whom do good work.

The development of the story, related in the picture as it passes through the mind of the man, is melodramatic. One scene in particular might be referred to as touching the spectacular. This occurs in the restaurant where the lover of the ballet soloist of the Comedy theater attempts to kill the wayward member of the idle rich because he has stolen his sweetheart. A strenuous fight follows the shooting incident, during which, by the way, no one is killed, the hangings of the room are set on fire, and the villain locks the couple in, intending that they should perish in the flames.

The young man's conclusion at the close of his meditation is that he is a useless wreck, and he is about to shoot himself when a little hungry waif, seeing him, rushes forward and interferes. She asks him if he also is poor, and sympathizes with him, telling him that she has had nothing to eat for three days. This incident changes the trend of his life, and he realizes that it is worth while living after all. He adopts the girl and proceeds to place what is left of his father's fortune to some good use.

Lubin Southern Studios Revamped.

The Lubin Southern Studio at Jacksonville, Florida, which has been undergoing extensive repairs and improvements during the past few weeks, is the scene of much activity these days, for Lubin has centered there a number of the best known comedians in the country and their ranks will be greatly added to within the next month. Arthur D. Hotaling, Lubin's chief comedy director, is in charge of the studio.

The Lubin Company has adopted a new policy in regard to its comedies. The majority of the new releases will be one reelers with a purpose rather than aimless contortions.

Bosworth, Inc., Produces "The Turkish Rug."

Work has been begun on the next Bosworth, Inc., production, "The Turkish Rug," from the pen of Mrs. Julia Ivers, the novelist and magazine writer. "The Turkish Rug" has splendid atmosphere and works out an unusually original idea. A little dancing girl of the Orient weaves into a rug the dreams and wistfulness of her girlhood and the rug finally sells at a high figure to a young New York connoisseur. Their eventful romance through the agency of the rug is a piquant novelty and constitutes as charming a love idyl as has been seen on the screen in some time.

More Great Northern War Pictures.

As the European war unfolds itself day by day before the eyes of the world and incident is added to incident, it is interesting to have authoritative views of the methods upon which one great army works. Such is presented in the Great Northern Film Company's "Behind the Fighting Lines of the German Army."

This consists of 2,000 feet of genuine scenes, taken in the war zones of Northern France and Eastern Prussia by the cameramen of the Great Northern Film Company and with the permission and cooperation of the German War Office. The scenes herein are of unusual variety and interest, and should leave an everlasting impression upon the spectator as a memento of the greatest war history has ever known.

Paramount Travel Pictures.

While the series of travel pictures released weekly by the Paramount Pictures Corporation are distinctly travel pictures, they are not the "cut and dried" kind of travelogue commonly termed instructive. They are interesting bits of scenic and sporting pictures depicting the pleasures, occupations and natural resources of the country where the pictures were taken. While they actually are instructive, there is so much action and current interest in the pictures that the instructive feature is not thrust upon you. The fact that strikes you at once at seeing them is beauty of the scenery and the good judgment of the photographer selecting the particular scenes shown. In a country so rich in scenic wonders and material interest as South America, it is hardly likely that it should have been neglected by the cameraman.

Noble Likes Work of Valli Valli.

John W. Noble, who has just finished making "The High Road" for B. A. Rolfe, writes to friends in the trade that he has found a woman who is just as strong for realism in pictures as he is. The lady in question is Valli Valli, who is starred in the picture. There is a whipping scene in "The High Road" and Valli Valli had the part of the woman receiving that form of punishment.

Mr. Noble carefully explained to the extra man who was to wield the whip, just how he could make the scene real without injuring Valli Valli. The scene was put on and the extra man got the realism bug which developed into such a love for his art that he forgot everything else. He whipped Valli Valli and he whipped her good and strong. And Valli Valli found a short time afterward that she was suffering from several severe welts across her back. Jack says she never flinched, but carried the scene throughout without a whimper. He offers the incident as one of the finest examples of love for realism that he has yet discovered.

"THE TERRIBLE ONE" (Lubin).

The fortunes and misfortunes of war are graphically pictured in this story. Men rise wrongly and fall rightly, according to the opportunities offered by rebellion and bloodshed. A worthy soldier's life and career is wrecked by an unscrupulous rival, who rises to be dictator of Mexico. He is, however, harrassed by revolutionists, one faction in the north, commanded by an unknown leader called "The Terrible One," especially fills the dictator with apprehension, although he little dreams that this man is one who had betrayed him and stolen the woman he loved more than life. Fearful of being thought a coward the dictator attacks "The Terrible One's" forces, only to be defeated and driven to seek shelter in an old fortress. There he is unearthed by his nemesis and in terror ends his own miserable life. The picture has been taken in Southern California and on the Mexican border, and is very realistic in atmosphere. The two stellar roles are played by W. E. Parsons and George Routh, directed by Captain Wilbert Melville, of the Lubin Western studio.

ALLIED FEATURES ENLARGE OFFICES.

The Montreal offices of the Allied Features, Inc., in the new Birkes building, the Canadian distributors of the Alliance Program are being remodeled and enlarged. It is intended to double the space heretofore used by the exchange and to give to the other departments the added room which the growth of the Allied has made imperative One of the special features of the new arrangement will be the facilities to be offered to the visiting exhibitor to make the Allied offices his headquarters while in Montreal. Similar alterations are to be made shortly in the Toronto offices.

Herbert Lubin, the general manager, is to make a tour of the Provinces as soon as the changes have been completed and intends to cover his field as it has never been covered before; making himself and his firm known to every exhibitor in the Dominion.

HARRY SPINGLER IN "THE PLUNDERER."

William Fox, head of the Fox Film Corporation, has selected Harry Spingler to enact the juvenile role in "The Plunderer," picturized from Roy Norton's famous modern romance of the same name. Rehearsals of the photoplay are now in progress at Dahlonega, Ga., under the direction of Edgar Lewis.

Mr. Spingler is conceded to be one of the foremost portrayers of juvenile roles in the cinema field, and is best remembered for his excellent work in connection with the Fox productions of "The Thief," "Samson" and "From the Valley of the Missing."

"THE UNAFRAID."

Pat O'Malley, the skilled horseman of the Edison studio, makes one of the finest falls from a horse ever seen in films in the forthcoming "The Boston Tea Party." As the horse goes over a ridge, he apparently is thrown—he throws himself, of course, into the air and to the stony ground. In doing so, he suffered a long gash in his hand, but he said the effect is worth the wound. The thrill comes from the fall allowing the heroine to win the race, saving her lover.

"FASHION AND THE SIMPLE LIFE" (Thanhouser.)

A model in a cloak and suit department loses the sylph-like figure which she feels has been the only inspiration that has led an attractive salesman to pay attentions to her, and also her job. These two related circumstances form the basis of an interesting comedy, "Fashion and the Simple Life," released by Thanhouser in the Mutual program.

Her job gone, the girl, who has saved money, decides to go on a vacation. She tells her salesman friend that she is going to Florida, but instead she takes up her quarters in a simple boarding house in a small Eastern village and slips into old clothes. By chance, the salesman goes there, too. He, too, gets into old clothes and when he meets his former friend there, garbed in simple and comfortable clothes, his first surprise changes to pleasure with an obvious and wholesome result.

"THE DAY OF RECKONING" (American).

"The Day of Reckoning" is a "problem" play, but by no means one of the sort an exhibitor need hesitate about showing. The plot revolves around the lives of two men and a woman and as the title implies, ends with the day of reckoning, which, however, is brought about by more than commonplace means. The problem is the deception of a woman who unfortunately hides the secret of her past when affection and dependence are offered in an honorable marriage. Matters are complicated by the existence of a child which has been left in the care of a friend, while the disgraced mother seeks employment and the means used by the loving mother to have her offspring by her side furnish further complications which present an appeal to the highest sympathies of an audience.

Vivian Rich, as the wronged wife, is attractive and restrained in her part and her interpretation of a shop girl is perfect. As the man who wronged her by a false marriage ceremony and then leaves her to her disgrace and later learning of her happy marriage, threatens to expose her past, Jack Richardson has a part which he fills with perfect ease. David Lythgoe, as the jovial, open-hearted bachelor, owner of a department store, is cast in a difficult hole which he admirably portrays, while Charlotte Burton, Louise Lester and others in the cast characterize their parts with strength and ability. The closing scene, in which the young wife, threatened to exposure by blackmailing letter from the father of the child which she has "adopted," presumably at the dying wish of her closest friend, prepares to leave, but is surprised in the act by her husband, is impelling, tragic and forceful. The effect of this scene is heightened by the absence of a stereotyped reconciliation and although "The Day of Reckoning" is brought to a conclusion, the ending is effected by the simple and sincere tenderness of the child.

"THE CUP OF LIFE" (Mutual.)

"The Cup of Life," the Mutual masterpicture, in which Bessie Barriscale is to make her moving picture debut as a star, is a dramatic story of a shop girl's fall from grace made unusually effective by the excellent acting of the cast, which includes Enid Markey, Charles Ray, Frank Borzage, J. Barney Sherry, Arthur Maude, Louise Glaum and Jerome Storm. It is Storm who registers the first comedy hit. His interpretation of the role of the awkward, sullen slum youth is amusingly true to life.

Miss Barriscale's performance, in which she shows a girl's descent along the primrose path, is perhaps the most remarkable of her career. She brings the full power of her histrionic training to bear on the part, and, thanks to her acting, the moral of the story is exemplified with startling distinctness.

"THE HEART PUNCH."

"The Heart Punch," the Imp one-reel drama which was released Feb. 8, and in which Jess Willard played the leading role, was exhibited at a number of picture houses in New York City the latter half of the week that Willard won the championship. The introduction of a supposed finish fight adds to the interest of the film. In the play proper, Jess is called upon to run nearly the entire gamut of stage emotions, even expresing heart-broken grief at the bedside of his dying child. That he avoids any suspicion of appearing ridiculous is quite remarkable, when his build and lack of experience at stage work are taken into consideration.

"SHADOWS OF THE HARBOR" (United-Ideal).

With the charming ingenuous Edna Payne in the leading role, with the sparkle, the sunlight and the splendor of California at its best as a background, and with a plot which holds the audience breathless during the realistic climaxes and dissolves them in tears in its more touching scenes, the two-reel photodrama, "Shadows of the Harbor," which will be released by the Ideal Company on the United program April 19, will be one of the most beautiful and attractive film plays which the Western company has presented. The scene is laid along the water front, overlooking the clear waters of the sparkling bay.

Peggy, the winsome daughter of the old Skipper Wilson, is deeply in love with the young officer, Ryan, who polices the docks and who is the terror of the thieves and wharf rats who infest the water front. The old skipper, however, despises the "landlubber," as he terms the policeman, but the eventual capture of the gang and the promotion of Ryan for his bravery brings the old man to terms, and Peggy and the young officer emerge from the shadows of the harbor to plight their troth.

"LONELY LOVERS" (Selig).

"Lonely Lovers," a two-reel drama, to be released Monday, April 26, contains the atmosphere of the theatrical boarding house. E. A. Martin produced this unusually appealing drama from the scenario of Maibelle Heikes Justice.

Violet Wynne is the object of much amusement at the theatrical boarding house, for she has theatrical aspirations. A silent believer in Violet is old Van Cleet, the comedy man, and Jerry Phillips, a stock actor. Garrick Wheelock, the great tragedian, has suddenly lost his leading lady through illness. Van Cleet suggests to Violet to apply, and her determination to seek the engagement is further cause for great laughter among the elect.

Refused an opportunity by Garrick Wheelock, Violet unconsciously displays so much emotionalism that the actor sees her hidden talent and engages her. Jerry is given an engagement in stock. Violet and Jerry are wedded in the church with the great actor as a witness to the ceremony. The amusement of the other Thespians is transformed into amazement and chagrin. Wm. Stowell, Marion Warner, Edwin Wallock and others co-operate to make this drama an interesting one in every detail.

FLORENCE REED IN "HER OWN WAY."

Florence Reed, last seen in the Famous players production of "The Dancing Girl" has been engaged by the Popular Plays and Players Company for appearance in "Her Own Way," by Clyde Fitch, which will be produced at the Fort Lee studios of that concern. "Her Own Way" will be released by the Popular Plays and Players on the program of the Metro Pictures Corporation early in June.

Miss Reed, star of A. H. Wood's production of the sensational Morton play, "The Yellow Ticket," has been before the public for about eight years, but it has only been three years since she first saw the light of stardom. Miss Reed's work in "The Yellow Ticket" was so favorably commented upon that within a week of its opening Mr. Woods decided to star the young actress.

David Belasco and Charles Frohman, when they combined for the production of "The Celebrated Case," which is now in revival at the Empire theater, selected Miss Reed for one of the most important parts in the piece. Miss Reed is admirably suited to screen play. Her heavy, dark features, brilliant eyes, elegantly lined countenance and her poise, all lend themselves magnificently to pantomime and her work in "The Dancing Girl" ample illustrated her emotional powers.

Work will begin almost immediately on "Her Own Way," which, under the direction of the Popular Plays and Players, will fit in perfectly with the dramatic production of Mme. Petrova.

"THE SILVER CUP" (Lubin).

The third episode of the Lubin serial, "Road O' Strife," tells a strangely interesting legend. In the grounds of the old Gershom estate there is a mineral spring, hanging at the side of the rock is a silver cup that, despite its value, has not so far been disturbed. Engraved on the cup is a warning that the water from the spring has great curative power, but if the cup is used for any other draught it will cause instant death. The realization of this legend is a marked factor in the story and will be keenly watched by those who carefully follow the story. In this number also Alene continues to develop a passionate love for Robert Dane, which his intense honesty deters him from responding to until the girl shall have had more worldly experience and knows herself better. So far the numbers released point to a very powerful story and one that will bring Emmett Campbell Hall into considerable notice. John Ince, the director, is undoubtedly giving the production every advantage.

"THE PROFLIGATE" (Essanay).

Intensely dramatic situations are developed throughout the three-act photoplay, dramatized from Arthur Hornblow's novel, "The Profligate." The interest and suspense is sustained throughout the drama, and the problem is not solved until the final scene. The plot evolves about the identity of the profligate, a lovable but somewhat dissipated young man, who is renounced because of his bad habits by the puritanical old man he had supposed to be his uncle. When "the uncle" is found murdered and his safe robbed, the profligate is accused and tried. He is finally freed, but the world believes him guilty. It turns out that the uncle's best friend had slain him. The profligate, in solving the mystery, finds that this man is his father. In the final scene, where the murderer confesses, the girl who has refused the profligate, although she loves him, because she feared he was guilty, learns the truth. The murderer overcome with fear, succumbs to heart disease, and the profligate, reformed, takes the girl to his heart. E. H. Calvert interprets the role of the profligate with unusual skill, while Ruth Stonehouse as the girl and Bryant Washburn as the profligate's friends are exceptional in portraying their parts. Release May 4.

"THE WOMAN" (Lasky).

The Lasky-Belasco production in pictures of "The Woman," which is announced for release on Monday, May 3, is the fifth in the series of productions made by Jesse L. Lasky in association with David Belasco. These productions, up to date, in chronological order are: "The Rose of the Rancho," "The Girl of the Golden West," Blanche Sweet in "The Warrens of Virginia," Edith Wynne Matthison in "The Governor's Lady" and "The Woman."

Like "The Governor's Lady," "The Woman" is a story of strictly modern and American interest. The plot of the play, written by William C. DeMille and first produced with extraordinary success by Mr. Belasco at the Belasco theater, is a remarkable combination of domestic and political intrigue.

The cast of "The Woman" is of unusual importance, and includes four artists who deserve to rank as stars: Theodore Roberts, James Neill, Mabel Van Buren and Lois Meredith. This is the first time that Miss Meredith, who is one of the most noted of the younger Broadway stars, has appeared under Lasky management, and it is positively stated that she has a remarkable opportunity in the role of Wanda Kelly, the heroic telephone girl. That she takes full advantage of it, all her observers will surely agree. In addition to these four artists, the cast includes such well known players as Ernest Joy, Raymond Hatton, Tom Forman, Helen Hill and Dr. Beitel.

The scene showing an all-night session of congress is without doubt one of the most extraordinary interiors ever produced in this country. A number of real senators and representatives were induced to pose in this episode.

BELL TAKES GREAT NORTHERN OUTPUT.

G. W. Bell, the active and hustling president of the Standard Film Company, of Texas, visited New York last week to look over the film market and secure additional high-class features for his concern, which is one of the largest and most progressive in the South. Mr. Bell was delighted with several productions he saw of the Great Northern Film Company, 110 West 40th street, and immediately signed a contract for the entire output of this firm. Beside the Standard Film Company, Mr. Bell controls the Palace Amusement Company, consisting of a circuit of some of the finest theaters in Texas.

"SAFETY FIRST" (MinA).

An exceptionally clever comedy, replete with surprising situations, called "Safety First," is the MinA release for May 6. The story concerns hen-pecked Patsy, who strolls the wayward path, despite instructions laid down to him by Tilda, his better half. Smoking is Patsy's forbidden delight. He runs up a bill with the town's lady tobacconist, who writes for her dues. Tilda finds the envelope. The feminine handwriting arouses suspicion in Tilda's mind and Patsy is chased from the house.

In the flowing bowl he seeks solace. Fearing to return and face the wrath of Tilda, Patsy decides on any port in a storm and uses a freight car as a haven of shelter. That night Patsy's Pullman is coupled to a train and the next morning finds him one hundred miles from home.

There he visits a friend and his wife. Patsy's whereabouts are discovered by Deacon Jones, of Patsy's church, who is away on a business trip. The deacon surmises Patsy is leading a double life, and communicates this information to Tilda. To the scene rushes Tilda. She finds Patsy in the company of his friend's wife, rocking her baby. The commotion that follows lands the principals in jail, but Patsy is happy, for there he may soliloquize and smoke in peace.

Albert McQuarrie gets a lot of comedy out of the part of Patsy, and is given able assistance by others in the cast. Milton H. Fahrney must be credited with very fine direction. The photography is clear, and the other technical points well cared for. "Safety First" is a comedy of unusual merit.

ROLFE IN CENTAUR STUDIOS.

The Rolfe Photoplays, Inc., is producing at the studios of the Centaur Film Company, Bayonne, N. J., a multiple reel dramatic subject called "The Flaming Sword," in which Jane Grey, later star of "Kick In," and Lionel Barrymore, who has been seen in many screen successes, are featured. Miss Diestel, late of the Edison company, is cast for the heavy leads. Mrs. E. Middleton and Glenn White also have principal parts. The company, which is directed by E. Middleton, with F. Champury as technical director, has just returned from Portland, Maine, after several weeks' work taking outdoor scenes.

"RENE HAGGARD JOURNEYS ON" (Rex).

Ben Wilson and Dorothy Phillips are featured in "Rene Haggard Journeys On," a two-reel drama to be released under the Rex brand on May 6. The drama tells a powerful story in which Ben Wilson, as a young artist, plays the leading role. The artist murders his sister's husband and is sentenced to death for the crime. His bereaved sister later marries a young lawyer, who is elected governor of the state. The newly created governor pardons the artist.

The scenes filmed in the young artist's studio were staged with great care. Mr. Wilson visited several Washington Square studios in addition to those clustering around the American Academy of Design in uptown New York in order to acquire the necessary local color. Hy Mayer, contributing editor to Puck, whose contributions regularly appear in the Universal Weekly, materially assisted by Mr. Wilson in putting some of the convincing touches into the action of the drama.

For instance, he taught Mr. Wilson how to hold his brush and crayon, to mix his colors and instructed him in the elementals of the ancient art of daubing. Most of the effects reproduced in the picture were taken from Mr. Mayer's studio and the paintings which appear on the walls of the studio were the same ones which received favorable mention in the 1912 Paris salon. A real artist's model, well known in MacDougal Alley, New York, posed for the head and shoulders in "Rene Haggard Journeys On."

COMING SELIG SPECIALS.

Within the near future the Selig Polyscope Company will release a number of Selig Spectacular Specials. Each picture-play will be five reels or more in length. Included in the number are: "The Millionaire Baby," the story of mystery and adventure from the pen of Anna Katherine Green. Harry Mestayer, Grace Darmond, John Charles and other star performers are featured. "A Texas Steer," in which Tyrone Power assumes the role of Maverick Brander. "The Rosary," an adaptation of the famous stage play of the same name written by Edward E. Rose, who also wrote the film version. "The Carpet From Bagdad," a wonderful drama of Oriental plot and counter-plot written by Harold MacGrath. There is a real sandstorm on the desert.

These Spectacular Specials will be released in the new feature film combination with which the Selig Company has become identified.

VITAGRAPH TO PICTURE BRADY STORY.

Cyrus Townsend Brady's story, "West Winds," is being prepared for the screen by the Vitagraph Company, under the direction of Lionel Belmore, who, with a party of Vitagraph players, has just returned from Texas, where the principal scenes were taken. "West Winds," which, when completed, will be a Broadway Star Feature in four parts, is a semi-military drama and employs in its presentation a regiment of United States soldiers and the Fourteenth cavalry, stationed at Fort Clark. Vitagraph players who enacted the principal characters in "West Winds" include Eleanor Woodruff, Darwin Karr, Ned Finley, Harry Northrup, Eulalie Jensen, Logan Paul, R. Peyton Gibbs and others.

THRILLS IN DYREDA PICTURE.

Franklin Coates, the noted Amazon explorer, who is playing the lead with Miss Mary Miles Minter in the Dyreda Art Film Company production, "Always in the Way," returned from Florida in advance of J. Searle Dawley, director, to work with J. Parker Read, Jr., on a few of the exterior scenes of the big production. Mr. Dawley and his three companies will return the latter part of next week. In speaking of the exterior scenes taken while away, Mr. Coates says at no time during his nine months' exploration work in the Amazon jungle has he held his life so cheap.

"A SON OF DESTINY" (Great Northern).

The next production of the Great Northern Film company, entitled "A Son of Destiny," will be released on or about April 15. The leading roles are played by the international stars, Miss Alma Hinding as Lady Clementine, and Henry Seeman as Lieutenant Hillier.

While out riding one day Lady Clementine is attacked by a band of ruffians. She is saved by Lieutenant Hillier, of the hostile army, who is on his way to her father's residence to get quarters. Charmed by Clementine, Hillier falls in love with her, to the aggravation of the old Count.

Countess Truro, Clementine's mother, fearing the outbreak of hostilities, hides the family jewels in a turret containing a secret vault. Later the Count sees Hillier enter the turret, where he has a rendezvous with Clementine. Following him the Count orders his daughter from the turret, and ignites a bomb. With a rope, which he found, Hillier escapes and arrests the Count, but blinded by his love for Clementine, he submits to her appeal and permits her father to escape. Hillier's action is discovered, and he pays with his life for his neglect of duty.

"RATED AT $10,000,000" (Lubin).

A very excellent story written by Adrian Gil-Spear, giving a prototype of the character and operations of a swell crook. A beautiful girl is the chosen victim and passes through some very trying and dramatic experiences. First she is robbed on the train of her hand bag containing her money and railroad ticket, but is relieved of her embarrassment by a courteous stranger. The crook also relieves the stranger of his pocketbook and finding his name and information of his quality registers at the Hotel in which the young lady is, poses as a millionaire and is taken up by the girl's father who is none too honest and tries to match his daughter with the supposed man of money. The stranger, however, comes to the rescue and in the end virtue is rewarded and vice goes to jail. The cast includes Lilie Leslie, Jack Standing and Joseph Smiley, who also has directed the production.

FLAMINGO COMEDIES TO BE RELEASED THROUGH WORLD FILM CORPORATION.

The Flamingo Company has now completed the first two comedy productions for distribution through the World Film Corporation. They will specialize on a comedy series entitled "The Feats of Felix," in which appears the famous German comedian, Chas. A. Mason, who appeared in Henry W. Savage's production, "The Prince of Pilsen." The third picture in this series will be "The Book Agent," a two-reel production to be released on June 21. All of the Flamingo comedies will be two or more reels in length, and so will not conflict in any way with the weekly one-reel World-Comedy Star pictures. The Flamingo director is Chas. A. Murphy, who was with the Lubin Company for three years.

WHOLE AMERICAN COMPANY TO LOS ANGELES.

Director Harry Pollard has taken one of the American Feature Companies, including Margarita Fisher, Lucille Ward, Joseph Singleton, Joseph Harris; Carlton Griffin, the company's new juvenile lead; Edward Langley, scenario director; James Douglass, assistant director, and two camera men to Los Angeles, where they will secure theater interior and street scenes for "The Girl from His Town," a coming "American Distinctive Creation," from the novel of the same title by Marie Von Vorst, published by Bobbs-Merrill Company. Fred Gamble, who has been transferred from the "Beauty" Company to a part in Mr. Pollard's productions, together with William Carroll, are expected to join the company, which will remain away for a week or so.

CYNTHIA DAY IN "WOMAN AND WINE."

The leading feminine role in the Wm. A. Brady production of "Woman and Wine" which is soon to be released on the World Film program is being played by Cynthia Day, who has had a wonderful experience on the stage, appearing in many plays and who will make her debut before the camera in this production, which is the first of Fred Thomson's features to be made at the World Film studios. In "Woman and Wine," William Elliott is being starred and from every indication it is certain that Mr. Thomson has produced a picture which will rank with his masterworks, "The Christian" and "The Sign of the Cross."

LEWIS FINISHES "THE PLUNDERER."

Edgar Lewis and his all-star company of photoplayers, headed by William Farnum, have completed the production of the big feature film, "The Plunderer," from Roy Norton's book of that name, and is on his way back to New York. It is a thrilling drama of the gold mines and this locale in the heart of the Blue Ridge gold belt was ideal for it. This marks the completion of Mr. Lewis' eighth big feature photoplay in a little more than a year. The others are "Samson," "The Thief," "The Littlest Rebel," "Capt. Swift," "Northern Lights," "The Gilded Fool" and "The Nigger."

"GENE OF THE NORTHLAND" (Bison).

Gene Gauntier and Jack Clark have produced a really splendid two-reel feature drama of the North in "Gene of the Northland," which is to be released on May 8 under the Bison brand. One of the scenes shows Miss Gauntier treed by a pack of wolves. The wolves are real wild ones.

In taking the picture a cage was built around a small clump of trees and within the cage another small barrier of iron rods was constructed for the cameraman. Out of focus of the camera lens the cages containing the wolves was brought in with a rope attached to the latch opening the doors. Miss Gauntier, before the wolves were released, took up her position in the tree out of reach of the sharp-toothed canines; Mr. Clark's cameraman then placed his camera in position behind the iron rod barrier and prepared to film the scene.

Mr. Clark, from outside the larger cage, pulled the rope, opening the cage doors, and released the wolves. After sniffing around for a few minutes the wolves spied Miss Gauntier in the tree and gathered in a circle about her, yelping and howling. Finally the biggest of the pack commenced to spring at her, snapping at her toes. The cameraman was prepared at all times, while filming the scene, to use his revolver on the wolves if occasion demanded, and Miss Gauntier's only danger lay in the possibility that she might fall from the tree.

"THE TRAMP" (Essanay).

Charles Chaplin, a tramp, sits at the roadside to eat his noon day repast. While the fastidious Charlie is polishing his nails another hobo steals his lunch and leaves a brick in its place. Chaplin makes his meal on grass, uses his tomato can for a fingerbowl, absent-mindedly wraps up the brick in his kerchief and walks on.

He comes on the hobo trying to rob a farmer's daughter and promptly taps him on the head with the brick. He then appropriates the girl's money himself, but gives it back when she weeps. The hobo's two companions rush to the scene, but the brick proves effective and they take refuge in a river beside which they camped.

Chaplin follows them, but they throw mud at him and he falls into the camp fire, setting the seat of his trousers ablaze. The hoboes keep him from the river and with trousers burning he rushes wildly in search of water, which he finds after doing considerable damage to his seating capacity.

As a reward the girl takes him home, where he eats his dinner from the mantlepiece. The farmer gives him a job, but he merely messes up the work, stabbing a farm hand with a pitchfork, knocking down the farmer with a sack of grain and spilling bad eggs on a spring poet.

That night he saves the farmer's house from being robbed by the three hoboes by mauling them on the head with a mallet. In the pursuit, however, he is shot and wounded by the farmer. He finds that being nursed by the farmer's daughter an agreeable occupation and falls in love with her. When he finds out she has another sweetheart, however, he picks up his kerchief and brick and becomes a tramp once more. Released April 12.

PIONEER WINNING WITH EVANGELISTIC PICTURE.

The Pioneer Feature Film Corporation has bought the rights on "John Redmond, the Evangelist" for Greater New York, and is greatly pleased with the success which the picture is achieving. It is being booked in the better motion picture theaters, an important booking made recently being Loew's Circle Theater for April 19.

"John Redmond, the Evangelist," is a four-part photoplay produced by the Great Northern Film Company, starring Valdemar Psilander and Elsie Frolich. The Bill Sunday activities in Paterson, N. J., give the picture a timely "punch" in the East at the present writing.

DU PONT FABRIKOID BOOKLET.

The Du Pont Fabrikoid Company has just issued an attractive and interesting booklet on Fabrikoid. Its cover, while of paper, is a striking reproduction of leather. It shows five different colors and grains of Fabrikoid.

The information in the booklet is of great importance to any one who is thinking of purchasing or making anything usually made of or upholstered with leather. Some of the subjects given attention are "How Many Hides Has a Cow?" "How Du Pont Fabrikoid Is Made," "Motor Quality Fabrikoid for Automobiles," "Craftsman Quality Fabrikoid for Furniture," "Fabrikoid for Bookbinding," and "Fabrikoid Dekoart and Muralart for Walls." The booklet is well printed and illustrated and will no doubt be in demand.

NEW WASHINGTON QUARTERS FOR WORLD FILM.

The World Film Corporation has outgrown its quarters in Washington, D. C., and on May 1 Manager Ben Drum and his staff will take possession of the three-story building located at 1004 E street, northwest. The new quarters will give Manager Drum 500 per cent more space.

TAYLOR WILL PRODUCE "HEARTS AFLAME."

Miss Mabel Montgomery is the latest star to be added to the Marion Leonard collection. S. E. V. Taylor is looking over the manuscript of "Hearts Aflame," which is to be the next big production, but it is too early yet to hazard an opinion as to the probable length of the big picture.

TWO KLEINE OFFICES MOVE.

The Atlanta and Toronto offices of George Kleine have changed their local addresses. Hereafter the Atlanta office will be located at 71 Walton street, Atlanta, instead of 43 Moore building. The Toronto office removes from 56 King street, west, to 96 Bay street, same city.

"CARPET FR

Harold MacGrath tore a page from "The Arabian Night's Entertainment," and, in the atmosphere of Oriental mysticism, he wove the warp and woof of fatalism. "The Carpet From Bagdad" is an entrancing tale in five reels of the land where Allah is Great. It is a story of ancient Bagdad, famed in song and story, of sooth-sayers, of crystal gazers, and of how a precious prayer-rug was boldly snatched from the innermost shrine of a sacred Mosque, passed from hand to hand, and of how, in its travels the rug imperiled the lives of two men and a beautiful young woman. An exciting romance of plot and counter-plot; of the fatalism of the Far East; of Caravans and of an oasis in the great desert. There is a Sahara sand storm; a conspiracy on the part of an international band of crooks; and it remained for Fortune, the innocent girl, to finally solve the intrigue. Over all there is the reminiscent touch of the Mosque's golden domes; the glittering spires of the Temples; the land of Allah in all its Oriental splendor. And Mahomed, guardian of the sacred carpet, who has grimly followed the emblem of his Faith through storm and stress, at the ending is resigned to defeat. Prostrating himself toward Mecca, he mutters the incantation of his caste: "What is to be, will be!"

Safety Fire Regulations

Ontario Government Revises Its Code Relating to Operators' Licenses—Provision for Shows in Churches, Schools and Halls Permits Using Without Booth, Machines Taking Not More Than Ten Amperes—Provincial Inspectors and Assistants.

By David K. Billings, Ontario Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE Ontario Government is taking steps to insure the last degree of safety in connection with the large number of moving picture theaters now operating in the province. In addition to enforcing the regular safety appliances, provision has also been made by a bill just passed to increase efficiency tests of the operators. In future their apprenticeship will be one year instead of the six months required up till now. This change will go into effect on May 1 and the only exceptions that will occur are where operating licenses from other recognized countries are produced.

It is also provided in the bill that any machine not using over ten amperes current or one quarter inch carbon may be used without a cabinet in churches, schools, etc., but not in picture houses. This is a privilege extended to public entertainment halls. Any operator who feels that his license has been suspended unfairly and that he has not received proper consideration may appeal to the provincial treasurer for reinstatement.

This branch of government business in Ontario has grown so rapidly that new assistants are needed and legislation was also passed providing for the appointment of an assistant inspector. He will be placed in charge of the Toronto theaters and will have orders to enforce the regulations thoroughly. Chief Inspector R. C. Newman will have personal supervision of the issuing of all licenses.

EASTER CARDS FOR REGULAR PATRONS.

The manager of the Family theater on Queen street, east, has been quite successful with a series of advertising innovations that he has been testing during the last week. He has obtained the names of his regular patrons by a careful watch and sent each one an Easter card. A detachable slip was affixed expressing the good wishes of the House, this slip when removed left a very handsome card. He has also inaugurated a potato contest. He has offered a prize for the biggest potato brought to the theater. The potatoes collected will be given to needy families in the neighborhood and the way the potatoes flowed in for the first three days was proof positive of the success of the scheme.

In Timmons, Ontario, there is a moving picture theater that is showing ordinary—very ordinary—moving pictures for a straight admission of twenty-five cents. Timmins is a few miles west of Porcupine, the old town, and is headquarters for the famous Hollinger gold mine. The theater in question is a frame structure seating about 250 and is well patronized. It gives about two hours' show, changed three times a week, one show a night and at present is showing a Universal programme of old releases.

MANAGER RALPH RUFFNER had some novel advertising for "Rule G," the railroad temperance film, at the American, in Butte. The attention of passers-by was first attracted by the sounding of a locomotive bell. Two big switches shunted the patrons into the entrance and out of the exit. Vendome to Show Films

Nashville's Prominent Legitimate Theater to Be Made into Picture House—Has Been Closed to Install Screen—Big Features Such as "The Nightingale" and "The Tigress" to Be Its Policy Hereafter.

By G. D. Crain, Jr., Chattanooga Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE Vendome theater, of Nashville, Tenn., a legitimate house that has been drawing such stars as Sothern, Drew, Mansfield, Marlowe and Jefferson for the past twenty-eight years, has capitulated to pictures and was closed on April 9 in order that it might be transformed into a moving picture house, to open on April 14. One of the largest screens in the city will be installed on the big stage and a new motion picture machine placed on the balcony. The theater will run as a straight feature film house and will show Ethel Barrymore in a five-reel feature as the initial performance. Olga Petrova in "The Tigress" will shortly follow and arrangements have been completed for a number of other big productions. The house will be open from 10 o'clock in the morning until 11 o'clock at night. The gallery will be reserved for negroes at an admission price of five cents, while the downstairs will bring ten cents. A large mechanical ventilator will be installed to purify the air in the auditorium.

EVELYN FARISS VISITING IN CHATTANOOGA.

Miss Evelyn Fariss, who during the past year has played co-star parts with Mary Pickford, Marie Doro, Tom Wise, John Mason and other well known actors, is visiting relatives at Chattanooga, Tenn. Miss Fariss was born at Chattanooga, but later moved to Louisville, from where she went East last year to start in the moving picture game as a rank amateur. At that time she could neither sing nor dance, but was given a position in the "High Jinks" company. Shortly afterward she was engaged by the Famous Players Company to help in producing the film "The Morals of Marcus," in which Marie Doro starred. She afterward played Phoebe Snow in "Pretty Mrs. Smith," but left the company at Providence and returned to New York. She has since played with the Imperial Company and the World Comedy Star Company. She took part in producing "The Dawn of Tomorrow" and "The Magic Bottle." Miss Fariss is barely eighteen years old, but is coming forward rapidly. She expects to return to New York in a few days.

ESSANAY PLAYERS AT SIGNAL MOUNTAIN.

E. H. Calvert, the well known player and producer for the Essanay Company, heads a party of fourteen screen stars who are encamped on the crest of Signal mountain, at Chattanooga. A number of plays will be produced on Signal mountain, which, besides its historical value, is one of the finest scenic locations in the country. Miss Lillian Drew is included in the personnel of the ladies in the party and will enact the "leading lady" roles over in the mountains in making the special pictures. "The Secret Price" will be the first picture produced. "Affinities," by Mary Roberts Rinehart, is to be among the early productions. A portion of this drama will be staged on Chattanooga Island, just above the Market street bridge. A five-reel feature, "Dain Justice," will be one of the early productions and permission will be obtained from the government to use a portion of the Eleventh cavalry in this production. The company will probably remain at Chattanooga throughout the entire summer. The Tennessee river will figure largely in the productions and one of Mr. Calvert's first questions, upon arriving in the city was, "How soon is the river warm." With Mr. Calvert is Fred H. Wagner, a special representative of the Essanay Company, and Harry A. Zech, said to be one of the crack photographers of the country. The company went direct from the Chicago studios. The personnel of the company is as follows: Miss Bettie Scott, Miss Lillian Drew, Miss Skinner, Miss Elsie Cardson, Fred Wagner, John Cossar, Grant Forman, Eugene Acker, Bertram Bates, John Meredeth and Edward Buddmeyer. The air and the climate are fine at this point and some exceptionally good pictures are expected.

BOY SCOUT PICTURES DELAYED.

The first run of the Boy Scout pictures at Chattanooga, Tenn., will be on April 22 to 24 instead of April 15 to 17, as was at first planned. These pictures were made by the Chattanooga Motion Picture Company and will be shown at the Auditorium in connection with the picture "Home, Sweet Home" and a special Keystone comedy production. The Mutual Film Company was unable to supply these pictures for the first date set.

IMPROVE PICTO THEATER.

The Picto theater, the largest five-cent theater in Chattanooga, has been closed for several weeks undergoing repairs, estimated to have cost about $10,000. Extensive improvements have been made on both the interior and exterior of the theater and it is now up to date in every respect. The reopening attraction was Warren Kerrigan in "Smouldering Fires." This picture was well adapted to the acting of the star and was pronounced to be a masterpiece. Attractive souvenirs were given to the patrons at the opening.

Another thriller will be the fall of an automobile from a forty-foot cliff at Riverside Park. Several pictures will be made in the business districts, showing the principal buildings, etc. A prize of $20 in gold has been offered for the best title for the pictures.

"A Fool There Was," the big feature production, made such a hit at the Princess theater at Memphis that it was recalled for a return engagement. At this first showing the theater was unable to accommodate the big crowds and many persons had to be turned away.

IOWA STATE COLLEGE PREPARING FILM CIRCUIT

Educational Institution Hopes to Establish a School Film Exchange.

Special to Moving Picture World from Midwest News Service.

BY giving a sample of educational pictures, the Iowa State College, at Ames, hopes to be able to establish a school film exchange, giving state wide service.

Prof. J. Will Parry, of the engineering extension department, is touring the state explaining the aim of the school and giving specimen programs. Among the films he is citing as good for schools are "The Man He Might Have Been," "The Birth of a Flower," "Spiders and Their Prey," "Pussy's Cousins," "The Crime of Carelessness" and "Wonders of Plant Life."

The plan is to have three schools on circuit, each program to stay a week on the circuit. Professor Parry has been given enthusiastic support at Keokuk, Burlington, Fort Madison, Cedar Rapids, Chariton and Ottumwa.

A GOOD WARNING.

Barring intoxicated men has generally proved wise. From Fort Dodge comes a police court story of a drunk who went into the balcony of a picture house and, when a rolling sea film was shown, became affected and imagined the balcony rail was the ship's rail. He paid a fine, but the impression upon the nauseated patrons below is detrimental.

"LOU" OF LOUISVILLE FOUND.

City's Heroine Has Been Discovered—Led Competition by Many Votes.

That Miss Jessie Stinson will play the part of "Lou" in a motion picture to be made in Louisville by the Standard Motion Picture Company for the Louisville Commercial Club was decided only after a big contest in which many young ladies of the city participated. The contest for the star role in the play was conducted by the Louisville Herald. Miss Stinson obtained 221,607 votes, while her competitors were far behind, the nearest having a total of only 167,812 votes. The contest ran for over a month and was not decided until the last day, when Miss Stinson threw in a large lot of votes that she had been holding back. However, she won the contest with ease and was in the lead throughout almost the entire contest.

Miss Stinson is small in stature, but has large blue eyes and a wealth of wavy brown hair, and is one of the prettiest girls in the Highlands. Miss Stinson has been interested in moving pictures for several years and has thought of going to one of the larger cities and trying for a position with one of the producing companies. Her father at one time appeared on the stage in plays in which Robert Hilliard and Lillian Russell took the star roles. Besides the honor of winning the popularity contest, Miss Stinson receives a reward of a $50 diamond ring from the Louisville Herald, a season ticket at the Majestic moving picture theater, and several other prizes.

While the contest was at its height, stump speeches and regular electioneering went right along. Miss Stinson and some of the other candidates appeared at the various motion picture houses, made talks before the audiences and asked for support. Dodgers, cards and various kinds of special advertising were also used, and automobiles were formed into a parade which toured the principal streets during the lunch hour each day.

New Camera for Amateurs

Louisville Man Has Invented a New Camera and Projecting Machine—Camera Is Light and Small, but Carries 100 Feet of Film—Projector Uses Incandescent Bulb and Has Short Throw—Company Being Formed to Promote Patent.

By C. D. Crain, Jr., Louisville Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

OSEPH L. ROOP, of Louisville, has just been awarded a patent on a moving picture projection machine and camera on which the applications have been pending for a year and eight months. The outfit is for amateur or home entertainments, although the machine may be made in regular film sizes later on. Mr. Roop and some Louisville business men have formed a company which will shortly file articles of incorporation, with a capital stock of $100,000. The camera, which weighs one and one-half pounds, will load with 100 feet of film which is three-quarters of an inch wide and which takes pictures nine-sixteenths of an inch wide by five-sixteenths of an inch from top to bottom. The projecting machine weighs four pounds and will operate from an ordinary incandescent bulb socket. The projecting machine will throw a picture five by seven feet at a distance of eight to ten feet. Mr. Roop has selected the name "Kinoscope" for his invention. The projection machine and camera will sell at $65, and if equipped with motor-driven machinery the outfit will sell for $90. Dies are now being made for the various parts of the machine. Mr. Roop also has working models of machines which operate on the same patents, but which will take even smaller pictures. Mr. Roop entered the moving picture game as far back as 1898, at which time he took the first moving pictures ever made in Louisville. In 1899 he built a camera which he called the "Cheesoscope" and which took pictures two inches by two and three-eighths of an inch, with the film operating across the camera.

KRITERION IN LOUISVILLE.

Announcement has just been made in Louisville for the Kriterion Film Supply Company to open an office in the city during the next few days. Fred Sheldon, secretary-treasurer of the S. & P. Film & Supply Company, has sold his interests in the S. & P. to Charles Pressy, president of the company, and Mr. Sheldon will take charge of the new Kriterion office. He stated that he was looking for a suitable location and expected to be ready for business in a week or ten days.

SCENARIO CLASS POPULAR.

The class in photoplay writing at the Louisville Y. M. C. A. now has thirteen scholars enrolled and is said to be accomplishing some excellent work. A good deal of interest in the outcome of the venture has been manifested by the associations in other cities. At a recent class meeting a lecture on photoplay writing was delivered by Attorney Emmet O'Neal, L. J. Dittmar, of the Majestic Amusement Company, also made a talk at the following meeting. Mr. Dittmar's subject was largely confined to motion pictures from the exhibitor's viewpoint.

CHILDREN'S SHOWS DON'T DRAW.

The Louisville Board of Censorship of the Children's Motion Picture Shows, has issued a letter in the form of a formal appeal to the mothers of Louisville asking that stronger support of the children's shows be given in order that the plan of special children's shows will not fall through. For several months shows have been held at the Mary Anderson theater at which special censored pictures for children are shown. These shows have not been patronized as well as they should although the price is only five cents to children and ten cents to adults. The board reports that it has received communications from California to Boston in which people have shown interest in the plan started in Louisville several months ago. As Louisville is the birthplace of the idea, it is not fitting that the nation-wide movement should go ahead without Louisville, and a vigorous campaign will be made to get a larger patronage for the theater.

BIG CROWD AT SUNDAY SHOWS.

Through some mix-up, the feature film, "Children of the Ghetto," in which William Lackaye takes the leading part, failed to arrive in time for the Sunday show of April 4 at the Mary Anderson, and the theater had to use such material as could be had from the film exchanges. Some Keystone comedy and other material was obtained and a fairly good bill produced. A great many people were disappointed, however, as the film had been advertised for Sunday and big crowds are the rule on Sunday, Easter or no Easter.

Mae Marsh, in "The Outcast," a four-part Mutual Masterpicture, drew a packed house at every show at the Alamo on Easter Sunday. Between the wind-up of the 7:30 o'clock show and the 9 o'clock show the crowd became so dense in the lobby that the employees had some trouble in handling the many patrons, in spite of the fact that the theater has a seating capacity of about 1,200.

LOUISVILLE BRIEFS.

At the Novelty a large cloth sign advertising "The Black Box" was displayed across the front of the building above the marquise for several days previous to showing the film. The detective story proved very interesting, and good attendances were in evidence.

At the East Broadway theater and the Highland theater the advertising film, "The Box from Larkin's," was shown on Saturday, April 3, at which time the Larkin Company, the big mail order house of Chicago, was having a special demonstration of its products and club plan of buying in a storeroom at Fourth and Market streets. This film was shown as a tailender for the regular performance.

In connection with the war pictures recently shown at the Masonic theater of Louisville, it is interesting to note how much interest was taken in these pictures. Letters were received from old Confederate and Union soldiers in which they commented upon the difference of warfare of today and that of the Civil War. The pictures were shown in Louisville for about two weeks and drew very fair crowds.

At Calhoun, Ky., in McLean county, the Bryant-Holder Amusement Company has been incorporated with a capital stock of $3,000. The incorporators are Ashton Bryant, H. C. Holder and C. R. Bryant.

Moving pictures displaying the big manufacturing plant of the Maxwell Motor Company were recently exhibited at the Willcox Opera House of Campbellsville, Ky. The pictures were shown free of charge and a big crowd was present.

Richard Parsons, assistant manager of the Orpheum, at Lexington, Ky., recently received a letter from Conklin and Irwin, attorneys of Springfield, Ill., in which he discovered that he was one of the heirs to a large estate left by a great-aunt.

At Irvine, Ky., Frank Leroy has reconstructed the stage at the opra house and installed a complete system of drop curtains, scenery, etc. Zudora and the Mutual Weekly is holding the attendance of the Monday night crowds, and Runaway June is appearing every Friday night.

A Fire Code Decision

In Philadelphia, Court of Common Pleas Rules That Houses Showing Vaudeville Must Comply with Laws Governing Regular Theaters—Suit by Lubin Palace Company vs. Fire Marshal Goes Against the Picture House.

Special to Moving Picture World from Philadelphia News Service.

ALL moving picture houses in which vaudeville acts are staged must comply with the rigid theater laws governing fire protection, according to a decision recently handed down by Judge Audenried in Common Pleas Court No. 4. The decision was given in a case instituted by the Lubin Palace Company, 1214 Market street, which sought to restrain the fire marshal from applying the theater law to their moving picture property.

The plaintiff asserted, during trial of the case, that it was not complying with the theater laws and contended that under an act of 1913 moving picture houses were exempt from the provisions of the act.

Assistant City Solicitor James Gay Gordon, Jr., who represented the fire marshal, contended that the section of that act which exempted moving pictures was unconstitutional. Judge Audenreid sustained that opinion.

The decision ends a long-drawn-out controversy between the picture men and the fire marshal, who will force owners of moving picture theaters in which vaudeville acts are staged to comply with the theater laws. These laws demand that the buildings shall be provided on every floor with standpipes equipped with hose; be supplied with a separate system of automatic water sprinklers and that the stage and dressing rooms shall be constructed of fireproof materials.

At the time the fire marshal took steps to enforce the law several moving picture houses closed rather than comply with the law. The case hinged on the constitutionality of the act of 1913. Mr. Gordon argued that the law was intended to exempt houses in which moving pictures were shown, but not in theaters where scenery was employed by performers. Judge Audenreid, in his decision, states that all houses in which vaudeville acts are staged must be classified with theaters and not as moving picture theaters. According to a statement issued after judgment was rendered, the plaintiff will appeal to the Supreme Court.

CASH PRIZES FOR ESSAYS ON "HYPOCRITES."

"Hypocrites," a feature film out of the ordinary, by Lois Weber, will have its premier showing in this city at the Globe theater shortly. "Hypocrites" teaches a lesson to those people who do evil yet dare to condemn the secret truth. The play is a daring one in its frankness, but has been handled by Miss Weber with the utmost delicacy. An opportunity for the patrons of the Globe to show their literary abilities will be presented to them in conjunction with the showing of this picture. Announcement is made by the management that cash prizes to a value of $250 will be provided and awarded to those submitting the best essays dealing with it, its theme and its power as a moral uplifting agent. The competition will be open to all and the prize money will be divided as follows: For the best essay, $100; second best, $75; third, $50; fourth, $25. The essays wil be limited to 500 words each.

More than 700 persons recently attended a private performance of D. W. Griffith's motion picture production, "The Avenging Conscience," in the Chestnut Street Opera House. The film will be presented this week at that theater.

BLUE LAWS IN DELAWARE.

The police commissioners have refused to give permission to a committee of prominent women of Wilmington, Del., to open the moving picture theaters on the Sunday of April 18, as a means of raising money for the wounded soldiers of Europe. They gave as their reason for refusing the committee, the fact that they thought it would be in violation of the old state blue laws which have never been repealed. The theater proprietors had offered the free use of their houses, pictures, machines and operators, and the committee had planned to take a collection at the door, but not to charge a direct admission.

BRYAN IN PROHIBITION FILM.

Secretary of State Bryan has posed before a moving picture machine in an effort to aid the national prohibition movement. The pictures are to be shown throughout the country in connection with a photoplay depicting the evils of intemperance and the final triumph of the prohibition movement. The secretary recently saw the picture for the first time. Mr. Bryan will be shown in his office as secretary of state greeting leaders of the prohibition movement and discussing the campaign with them. He will also be seen at his desk signing pledge cards, the same cards that he used in his great speech on prohibition in the Billy Sunday tabernacle in this city. While Mr. Bryan was performing these offices for the prohibition movement, Secretary of War Garrison, whose office is under the same roof as that of the secretary of state, was asked if he intended to appear in the pictures. His answer was a decided "No."

PHILADELPHIA BRIEFS.

Charles E. Futcher is about to erect a moving picture theater at 6149 Woodland avenue, West Philadelphia. The new theater will be of brick construction and the dimensions of the property will be 50 by 200 feet. The building will cost in the neighborhood of $15,000 and will be one story in height.

Each evening there will be two performances, starting at 7 and 9 P. M., respectively. The admission to the balcony will be five cents and to all of the main portions of the house ten cents. The bills have been announced for the opening week and include many feature attractions which should help fill the house to capacity.

SALT LAKE CITY NEWS LETTER.

By H. W. Pickering, Salt Lake City Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE LIFE OF OUR SAVIOR" in motion pictures at the Utah theater this week has attracted considerable attention and drawn fairly large houses. In a measure, the people of Salt Lake seem divided on their opinion of the propriety of reproducing the Savior via animated photography and, while there has been nothing but praise for the care and workmanship displayed in the making of the pictures, some criticism of the subject has been heard. The next bill for the Utah theater, which may permanently become listed among the local motion picture houses, will be "Sappho."

Yet more "war pictures" were shown at the Salt Lake theater last week when the Salt Lake Tribune displayed its set of syndicated motion pictures, taken in the war zone. The pictures were all first class from every standpoint, though they had to overcome an idea in the minds of Salt Lakers to the effect that motion picture photographers are not allowed in the trenches during fighting or directly on the firing line. It was a little difficult to reconcile the official dispatches from Europe to the effect that motion picture men were not allowed to turn the crank amid a rain of bullets and the announcement of the producers that the pictures were the real thing.

L. W. Clement, motion picture cameraman of Salt Lake, has just returned from one of the longest tours ever taken in a runabout. Mr. Clement and his wife left Salt Lake last August in a small Ford for Boston, arriving in that city within twenty-one days. From Boston they went to Maine for a visit to Mr. Clement's parents. After two months at the old homestead they made the return trip to Los Angeles.

Joseph V. Yeager has resigned his position as manager of the local branch of the Fox Film Corporation and will leave for Denver within a few days. Mr. Yeager expects to locate in Denver and has announced that he will have several big features for leasing on the "state's rights" plan. Mr. Yeager will be succeeded on Monday, April 12, by Joseph B. Roden, formerly with the Mutual Film Corporation of Utah and is well acquainted throughout this territory. William Alexander, special representative of the Fox Film Corporation, is in the city to make arrangements for the management transfer.

The Manti theater at Manti, Utah, is the only municipal theater in the state. The citizens of the thriving little city to the south of Salt Lake built the theater many years ago and have never relinquished control of it. Its seating capacity is about 700. The house is leased by C. M. Stringham, who has engineered the production for the past four years and has made the theater one of the best motion picture houses in the state.

The motion picture theater at Monroe, Utah, changed owners last week when it was sold for $4,000 to William Morrison, Jr., and Perry Asay by John and James Nordgren, the builders. The theater was especially built as a motion picture house and has been prosperous since the opening day.

To take motion pictures of sheep being sheared by hand and by power machinery, George W. Gosehn, government photographer of the forest service, has been called to take a trip through Utah and Wyoming. Early next week he will go to Draper, Utah, to take several hundred feet of pictures of shearing at the power plant near that town and later will take pictures of shearing by hand at Lofgreen, Utah. In Wyoming he expects to feature the Australian method of handling wool and before completing his tour will take pictures of log driving on the Green river near Evanston, Wyo.

"A Fool There Was," Fox production, will play a return engagement at the Liberty theater for a week commencing Sunday, April 11.

"Officially Censored"

Feeling in Western Pennsylvania on Political Censorship Shown in Interesting Reflections by the World's Pittsburgh Representative—The People See the Censors' Work in the Films and Smile—Spectators the Final Censors.

Special to Moving Picture World from Pittsburgh News Service.

IT HAS been quite the fashion to charge all youthful depravity to the exhibition of exciting moving pictures. It was formerly the habit to charge it to trashy novels, and it is interesting to note a revival of this plea by a reformed convict, whose interview appeared recently in a Pittsburgh newspaper. This is all mostly "fudge." It is one way in which parents evade responsibility for sins of commission and omission in the training of the home. It will not be denied that trashy and similar moving pictures may influence the youthful mind if there is no counteracting moral instruction and nothing more healthful is offered to sate the natural craving for novelty. In those olden days there were good books quite as interesting as those which were supposed to make youthful bandits; there are more wholesome films than of the trashy kind. The youth can be interested in one sort as well as in the other, and the censorship ought to be with the parents.

It was said by the poet Pope that "'Tis with our judgments as our watches—none go just alike, yet each believes his own." It is couplet in which there is "more truth than poetry," although the meter is perfect. The censors are no exception to the rule—they may err as easily as others. Amusements cater to the public. We may be sure that if children are forbidden to attend places where demoralizing pictures are permitted those places will soon close, provided the children are encouraged to attend the places where instructive and innocent pictures are exhibited. If any small attempt to cater to vitiated tastes of older persons it is a case for the police—not one for censors. The line, "Passed by the censor," always brings a smile to the lips of the habitue of the moving picture shows and it excites his disgust and wonder when the picture proves that it should have been censored again. "To the pure all things are pure," and the opinion grows that censors are all pure—or blind. Give the people a chance to do their own censoring and put the responsibility where it belongs and there will be an improvement in the pictures shown.

METRO BOOKING BRANCH OPENS IN PITTSBURGH.

The All Star Rental Company of New York City and the Metropolitan Booking Company of Philadelphia will soon open a branch office in Pittsburgh, Pa., in the Hartley Building, on Fourth avenue. It has been reported that Edwin Rockwell, a well-known showman, who has been associated with some of the leading Broadway attractions, and for the past three seasons connected with the R. B. I. Theater Enterprises throughout the middle west, promoting the interests of the above attractions, will be put in charge of the Pittsburgh office.

MANAGER HAFNER CIRCULATING PETITION.

Manager John Hafner, of the Keystone theater, Natrona, near Pittsburgh, Pa., is having a petition circulated for the repeal of the state moving picture censorship. Mr. Hafner contends that the national censorship is sufficient and that the state censors pass pictures which are rejected by the National Board. Every picture passed by the state board is assessed $2.50, which adds just that much to the cost of producing and showing pictures and eventually, of course, it comes out of the pocket of the people, either in the way of higher admissions or inferior pictures.

FIRE LIABILITY OF THEATERS.

Fred J. Herrington has given out the information in reference to the bill passed on second reading, the Lauler bill, imposing liability for the cost of extinguishing fires in Pittsburgh and Scranton on persons, firms or corporations "which occur through their criminal intent, design or wilful negligence or where they have not complied with any law, ordinance or other lawful regulation for the prevention of fire," that but a very few houses in Pittsburgh would be exempt in case of fire, the great majority of picture houses having been erected prior to the enactment of the present rigid building laws.

S. E. ABEL'S BRIGHT OUTLOOK.

Sydney E. Abel, manager of the Continental Feature Film Corporation, at 420 Penn avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., reports that the past week has brought an increase of business far beyond expectations. The quality of the Continental releases is of such calibre now that exhibitors are fast falling in line to secure it. Mr. Abel is enlarging and remodeling his offices and has also added to his office force, which is kept on their toes all the time in their efforts to show results and in the interest of the exhibitors. Mr. Abel says that there is no abatement in the demand for Mutual master pictures.

PITTSBURGH BRIEFS.

Zack Wartanian, proprietor of the Auditorium in Johnstown, Pa., which has been used as a roller skating rink during the winter season, was in Pittsburgh recently making arrangements for equipment and films for the reopening of this house as a picture theater on April 12. The Auditorium has a capacity of 3,000 chairs, but only about 1,200 chairs will be installed, as Mr. Wartanian thinks that will be sufficient to accommodate the crowds he can attract, as the house is located somewhat out of the business section of the city. He placed an order for Powers 6-A machines at the Feature Film & Calcium Light Company. An order was also placed for a Wurlitzer theater orchestra, style "G duplex," with the W. F. Frederick Piano Company.

It has been rumored that a Main street location in Butler, Pa., has been leased for a new moving picture playhouse which will open for business in the summer. The room in question is occupied at present and cannot be secured for the new purpose until in May.

Architect Louis Brosie is taking subbids on a motion picture theater to be built at Liberty avenue and State alley, Bloomfield, Pittsburgh, Pa. The building is to be quite elaborate and is estimated to cost about $20,000.

The Olympic, Fifth avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa., has been newly painted and decorated and it presents a handsome appearance.

A friendly spirit is shown in East Liberty between the management of the Cameraphone and the Regent. They exchange slides, each house advertising the other's current attraction.

Prof. Gerechter, of the Anchor theater, on Diamond street, Pittsburgh, Pa., has installed a Wurlitzer violine piano which has come to stay after using several different kinds of electric pianos in the three months that this theater has been opened.

Some extensive improvements have been made by Manager J. E. Davis in the Metro offices at 212 Fourth avenue, Pittsburgh. The manager and bookkeeper now have separate rooms, and one has also been provided for General Manager Skirboll, which also is used as the stenographer's room.

Highland Books Players

New Cincinnati Film Manufacturing Company Said to Have Closed Contracts with Large Number of Picture Actors—Architects Are Preparing Plans for Studio Buildings—"Lagoon" Property, Near City, Not Yet Bought.

By Kenneth C. Crain, Cincinnati Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE Highland Film Corporation, whose organization and plans for operations in the vicinity of Cincinnati were referred to in these columns some time ago, is showing every intention of going right ahead with its work, with the purpose of being in a position to produce pictures within a relatively short time. Negotiations are still under way for the purchase of the Lagoon, a well known amusement resort in Kentucky, conveniently located with reference to Cincinnati, and Rapp & Zettler, a local firm of architects, are perparing plans for the several additional buildings which will be necessary. According to J. T. Ford, who is in charge of the company's interests in Cincinnati for the present, contracts have been closed with about sixty actors, some already well known as film performers, and others on the stage, to work with the company, and five working companies will be kept busy regularly after production is started. Branch offices for the distribution of the output will be opened, according to plans already perfected, in a dozen or more cities in this country and Canada, Mr. Ford states. J. Kapfer, who handled the stage production of "The Girl of the Golden West," and who has also been responsible for several big film successes, is announced as the company's general director, indicating the high character of its productions from the technical standpoint.

FRANKEL OPENS HIPPODROME.

I. W. Frankel's Hippodrome, which is to be opened shortly, if it has not already been opened by the time this is printed, in Newport, Ky., across the river from Cincinnati, is Mr. Frankel's latest and largest venture in the moving picture business, in which he has had a success of proportions which do not seem small, even when compared to some of the spectacular rises of the big men in the game. He opened one of the earliest houses in Cincinnati, some ten years ago, and then, after the success of the business, and the fact that moving pictures had come to stay had been demonstrated, moved with the tide, or perhaps just a little ahead of it, establishing in succession the Colonial—on the site of the Crystal, his first venture—and others, including the Hippodrome, in Cincinnati, and several houses at various points in this city and elsewhere. The Hippodrome has the distinction of being one of the largest houses in Kentucky, seating 2,000 people on its ground floor; and there are few in Cincinnati which are larger.

The Williamson submarine pictures, shown at the Grand Opera House last week at ten and twenty-five cents, under the Universal imprint, proved to be one of the moving picture successes of the season, drawing large houses and exciting general interest.

FILM KEEPS LOCAL HISTORY.

The extent to which moving pictures figure in virtually every occurrence of any importance was never better shown than in the vacating of the old Hamilton County court house last week. Pictures were taken of the employes leaving the old building for the last time before the beginning of the work of demolition, and, on the other hand, the ceremonies incident to the stunt of breaking ground for the new building were also immortalized in the same manner. The films will be preserved as a part of the records of the commission, which has charge of the construction of the new building, and copies will be deposited, with other records of interest, in the cornerstone, to astonish some future generation. In fact, at every move in the work of starting the new building and tearing down the old the omnipresent and irrepressible moving pictureman was and will be on hand. In the same connection it is understood that when the old jail is destroyed there are to be some interesting things staged by some producing company for the camera, as applications have been received from several sources for the use of the building for that purpose. The commissioners state that they know of no objection to this, and a real jail will consequently be available for destruction—a fact which offers great possibilities to an imaginative director or scenario-writer.

THEATER AFFILIATIONS GROW.

Virtually every theater of any size in Cincinnati is now a member of some organization, outside of the Exhibitors' League, designed for the purpose of securing for its members special service, more particularly with reference to feature productions. The Big Time Feature Exhibitors' Association, one of the newest and at the same time one of the most important of these special associations, now numbers within its membership thirteen local houses, as well as others in West Virginia and Kentucky, while the older Exhibitors' and Managers' Association, with eighteen houses in its ranks, including such high class theaters as the Alhambra, the Nordland Plaza and the Orpheum, is stronger than ever before. Both recently reminded the public of their existence, and of the fact that their members exhibit only high grade feature films, by using space in local papers, which showed the names of all houses members of the respective organizations.

AIRDOME IN AVONDALE.

The owners of the Forest theater, one of the leading houses in Avondale, are reported to be contemplating the construction of a good sized airdome at a strategic point in that vicinity, for the purpose of making a bid for the summer business which sometimes goes in other directions. M. Sax, a local architect, is engaged on the plans, which are for a plant more finished and more ambitious in several respects than the average open-air house, and if the owners decide definitely upon putting up the structure estimates will be asked for shortly. It is understood that the seating capacity will be in the neighborhood of 700.

GOOD HYGIENE PICTURES.

The Ohio State Board of Health has gathered together one of the best and most impressive collections of films upon matters connected with its work in existence, many of them having been made expressly for the Board. Among these are "Toothache," a film indorsed by the Ohio Dental Society, impressing the necessity of dental hygiene; "Summer Babies," "The Visiting Nurse" (Selig), "Hope" (Selig), devoted to the means of curing tuberculosis, and a number of others, all interestingly treated and all hammering in a health point. The Board exhibits these films free of charge all over the state, Piqua, for example, being visited lately. In that city the films were shown under the auspices of the associated civic organizations in the auditorium of the high school building. They have done a vast amount of good, according to the Board, and have been of inestimable benefit in its work, getting to the public in a manner which would have been impossible without the pictures.

CINCINNATI SHORT NOTES.

Manager W. E. Brown, of the Nordland Plaza, one of Cincinnati's leading houses, made himself solid with several hundred youngsters who are entitled to a good deal more fun than they get when, one day last week, he had a special performance of "Jess of the Mountain Country" for their benefit. They were the orphans in several local asylums, and everything was donated free of charge for the afternoon, the World Film Corporation, the Mutual, the Pathe and others contributing films, and making up a program which could hardly be surpassed for the entertainment of the little chaps.

The C-It Amusement Co., of Ashtabula, O., recently incorporated by George H. Smith, Arthur J. Cooper and others, with a capital stock of $15,000, plans the construction of a handsome house in that city.

The Tivoli theater, in Lima, O., has changed hands, V. Buchanan, who has been the owner for some time, disposing of it to C. H. Harris. The place will be completely redecorated inside and out, being closed for two weeks for that purpose. It will reopen under the new management as soon as the improvements are completed.

A handsome and modern photoplay house will be built at Steubenville, O., by a company recently organized for that purpose by John K. Populias and others of that city. The company is known as the Rex Photoplay Co., and is capitalized at $25,000.

PICTURES HELP PASS BILL IN OKLAHOMA.

Law Will Go Into Effect

Kansas State Censorship Law Effective from April 12th—Protest of Picture Men Unavailing—Three Inspectors of Films Named—Will Have to Censor Twenty-five Reels a Day and More—Delays and Inconveniences Feared.

Special to Moving Picture World from Kansas City News Service.

THERE is a great spirit of unrest among the film exchange men in Kansas City over the censorship law that goes into effect in Kansas on April 12th. It it understood that several of the exchange men recently made trips to Topeka, but failed in their mission, for the state announces that the law will go into effect on April 12th as announced. The moving picture exhibitors in Kansas who will practically be forced out of the business by the unfairness of such a law have been treating the rotten legislature there with more friendliness and consideration than it deserves. The state did not have a suitable show place of its own, so the exhibitors granted them the permission to use their theaters and machines in the morning hours to inspect the films. The inspectors have been named—the Rev. Festus Foster, of Topeka, and Miss Carrie Simpson, daughter of Ben F. Simpson, of Paola. W. D. Ross, state superintendent of public instruction, and S. M. Brewster, attorney-general, recently held a long conference with the moving picture men. The Kansas City exchanges are feeling just a bit blue over this and feel certain that the two inspectors appointed will not be able to do the work, for they are shipping new films into the state at about the rate of twenty-five new ones every twenty-four hours, and they will not be able to inspect these films in that time, for the business in Kansas is steadily increasing and it will not be long until they are shipping many more pictures in the state than they now are. The exchange men claim that it means that practically all the exhibitors in Kansas will probably have to quit the business.

The picture business is a strong competitor of the saloon; some interests would like to license churches.

BURFORD GIVES FASHION SHOW.

Roy Burford, manager of the Rex theater, one of the most beautiful little houses in the state of Kansas, and situated aside from the business district of Arkansas City, conducted recently as an advertising proposition a fashion show of its own, in co-operation with a leading merchant. He made arrangements with one of the leading dry goods stores of the city, selling the store 300 tickets at ten cents each, good for the one night of the fashion show. The company distributed the tickets to their customers. At the first show the house was filled, and hundreds were waiting on the sidewalk. The second show found the house's capacity taxed. The theater seats 650, and Manager Burford says that he is certain that 1,400 persons attended the performance.

The fashion show consisted of a display of gowns on "living models," the models being twenty-eight of the best-known ladies of Arkansas City, who had been selected by the merchant and had gladly consented to participate. The ladies appeared on the stage after the film show, one at a time, each attired in a gown of the latest fashion. Among the older, as well as the younger, of the living models were society leaders and members of the wealthiest families. At the conclusion, one of the participants rendered a vocal solo, while the others, ranged on the stage, joined in the chorus. The pronounced success of the show—which was very effective in establishing the reputation for taste and enterprise of the Rex—was due largely to the fact that Mr. Burford had prepared an attractive stage setting for the models; had arranged for a spotlight that followed them around the stage, and had secured the co-operation of a really high class store.

KANSAS SHORTER NOTES.

H. F. Forbes, manager of the Empire theater at Spearville, Kan., is now one of the strongest adherents of the feature film. His recent experience with "The Perils of Pauline" was among the satisfactory incidents of his career. Now that the roads are getting better for traffic, he is actually getting business from Dodge City, and a frequent occurrence is to see several autos from that city, eighteen miles from Spearville, lined up in front of the Empire.

The Grand theater, at Marysville, Kan., which has been closed for some time, is soon to be reopened. A. Goodman, who is to be manager of the theater, says that the building will be completely remodeled and everything will be done to make it a first class show.

Thornburrow & Weary recently opened a new moving picture theater at Wetmore. The building was completely remodeled, and the theater is one of the best in the town.

E. E. Richards, manager of the Wunderland theater, on Twelfth street, hired a jitney bus for two days and a night. He also rented the moving picture, "A Jitney Bus Elopement," featuring Charlie Chaplin, whose popularity in moving pictures has been almost as rapid as the jitney business in Kansas City. The jitney bus was entirely placarded with six-sheet posters of the picture that was being shown at the Wonderland and driven about the city, especially the downtown streets.

MISSOURI NEWS LETTER.

Special to Moving Picture World from Kansas City News Service.

THE Jefferson theater, in Springfield, Mo., has been undertaking something that but few small town theaters try to do. They have been showing certain pictures for three and four days. They recently showed the Paramount picture, "Buck-Shot John."

The Hippodrome theater, at Springfield, Mo., is selling reserved seats for their shows. This is something that but few theaters in the state do and only one moving picture house in Kansas City does. But it is an excellent way to work up a good patronage, because tickets can be bought in advance and good seats made certain to the patron. At least, the management has found that it is not a bad business idea.

The Star theater, at Columbia, Mo., recently showed a feature that drew a good crowd of the students from the University of Missouri. It was the Vitagraph Broadway Star feature, "The Sage Brush Gal." The theater also offers one act of vaudeville at each performance.

"The Spoilers" and "The Christian" recently formed a big bill at the Delphus theater at Carthage, Mo. The price of admission for each of these shows was twenty-five cents for adults and fifteen cents for children. These two pictures, more than any other, have shown their remarkable ability to draw the price that they are worth, and the small town theaters can put them on with the confidence that they will pay.

The Sho-To-All theater, at Carthage, Mo., recently exhibited George Kleine's record maker of record breaker, "Quo Vadis." The play was well attended during the two days' engagement there.

The World Film Corporation furnished a picture for the Star theater in Hannibal, Mo., recently in which nearly everyone in town was interested. The name of the picture was "Money." It is needless to say that the title of this picture drew a large attendance.

NO FIGHT FILMS FOR OTTAWA.

Johnson-Willard Pictures Barred—Can Be Seen in Quebec, in Hull, Across River.

(By Carl Ketchum, Ottawa Correspondent of the Moving Picture World.)

MOVING picture scenes of the Johnson-Willard fight at Havana will not be viewed by Ontario audiences. The Ontario Board of Censors has reached the decision that it would be unwise to depart from precedent by allowing the exhibition of fight scenes and will turn down all applications. The stand taken by the provincial censors has always been based on a desire to avoid exhibitions of brutality or the violent passions, and notwithstanding much opposition this position has been strongly maintained.

Official notification has been received by local managers of the decision of the censors, and any attempt to rush an evening's program without the censor's stamp will be heavily penalized. However, the same attitude will not likely be taken in Quebec, where the censorship is much easier, and Ottawa people, anxious to see the fight pictures, will merely have to take an electric car across the river to Hull, where the picture managers are now making arrangements to show the big bout.

THE FRANCAIS DOING WELL.

With a daily attendance today that exceeds the accommodation the Francais theater, the largest moving picture house in Ottawa, this week completes two years of existence. Situated on Dalhousie street, in a very central location of the city, the Francais has, since its opening, steadily progressed, under its capable management by Mr. Ken Finlay. It is one of the most up-to-date in every particular to be found anywhere in the Dominion. Mr. Finlay has a permanent nine-piece orchestra, and is now running the Universal program.

KEN FINLAY, PIONEER.

Ken Finlay holds the distinction of being the man to bring the first moving picture to Ottawa. He is, without a doubt, the most prominent manager in the city, and, now operating the three largest motion picture houses, Francais, Imperial and Family, he does more business with the picture producers than all other local houses together. At one time manager of the old Peoples on Rideau street, the first to show pictures in Ottawa ten years ago, Mr. Finlay has met with nothing but success, and he is, to a great extent, responsible for the present popularity of the moving picture here. He has taken pictures here and shown them in his theaters and has probably introduced every available invention for the comfort and pleasure of his thousands of patrons.

OTTAWA BRIEFS.

Mr. Sam W. Whitehead, owner of the big nine-reel picture, "The Spoilers," made a visit to Ottawa this week with the picture which was presented as the feature at the Family theater.

The Thirty-eighth Regiment, in training here for the front, were entertained recently to an evening in the Strand theater. The soldiers attended in a body and were highly pleased with the generosity of the management.

The Auditorium in Britannia, a summer resort a mile outside the city, and other summer theaters are already making arrangements for early opening. They will, for the most part, run moving pictures, obtaining five and seven reelers for features.

UTICA'S FINE THEATER.

Alhambra Amusement Company Building Fine Picture House on Oneida Square.

By Billy Bison (229 Oxford Ave.), Buffalo Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

NO pains or expense have been spared on the plans for the new moving picture theater to be built at Oneida Square, Utica, N. Y., by Henry G. and Arthur J. Lux, of the Alhambra Amusement Co. The house will be fireproof. There will be ample entrances and exits, steam heat, forced ventilation and a vacuum cleaning system. There will be twenty-five boxes commanding a clear view of the screen. The boxes will be upholstered and furnished with movable chairs.

The entire balcony will be devoted to private boxes. There will be one large family box in the center and in other parts of the balcony will be boxes, all arranged so as to insure the occupants from intrusion. In the back part of the balcony will be a fireproof machine room and several offices for the managers. The house will seat 1,200 persons. The doors will be provided with panic bolts, rods extending across the door on the inside, and the pressure of a child's hand on the inside will at once open the door. The auditorium will have an elaborate beam and stucco ceiling and there will be a high-grade orchestra pipe organ. Henry G. Lux, Jr., and F. J. Lux, experienced showmen, will be general managers of the house.

BIJOU HAS NEW LOBBY.

A new lobby, which is artistically arranged, has been built at the Bijou theater, Main and North Division streets, Buffalo. Manager Byrne has a new sign to the effect that other theaters come and go, but the Bijou continues to entertain thousands. This is one of the pioneer houses of Buffalo and is located in the heart of the business district.

BUFFALO BRIEFS.

In order to add realism to moving pictures of the Vanderbilt cup races, Manager Edel of the Strand, Buffalo, had a real automobile back of the screen. The car was "jacked up," so it was stationary. When the pictures of the races were at their best the machinery of the automobile was set in motion and the effect was so striking that intense enthusiasm was aroused in the audience. Mr. Edel recently featured Jess Willard, champion pugilist, in moving pictures.

Proprietors of Buffalo moving picture theaters will be well represented at the convention of the New York State Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, to be held at the Hotel Statler in that city Wednesday, April 21. Special entertainment will be provided for the visitors.

Work is progressing on the Fisher opera house at Seneca Falls, N. Y.

The Grand theater building, Yonkers, N. Y., has been leased by Frederick F. Proctor. The contract for the building was awarded last November to George T. Kelly at a figure said to be in the neighborhood of $246,000. It will take several months to finish the structure. It will be five stories high and absolutely fireproof. The theater will have a seating capacity of about 2,500.

The Joyland theater of Watertown, N. Y., has been leased by George A. Lalonde of Montreal.

Moving pictures of civic and business features of several cities of New York state may be shown at the conference of mayors and other city officials at Troy, N. Y., June 1, 2 and 3.

Many New York state farmers have visited the moving picture theater in connection with a train sent out by the New York Central Railway and the Cornell Agricultural College. Pictures and lectures on farming are given. Many rural points have been covered by the train.

George S. Burkholder and others will build a theater at Mount Hamilton, Ont.

INDIANA STILL HAS CITIES WITHOUT SUNDAY SHOWS

Lafayette Manager Dared not Try Conclusions with Mayor.

Feared Riot.

Special to Moving Picture World from Indiana News Service.

THE Sunday opening struggle still is the biggest thing in the minds of exhibitors outside of Indianapolis and Elkhart, where the doors now swing freely. The exhibitors lost in the effort at Lafayette through a combination of circumstances in which the European war had a part. Manager David Maurice, of the Columbia Amusement Company, in charge of the Family theater, arranged for a program in which German war pictures were to be shown. The event was advertised as a benefit for the relief of the German war sufferers, twenty-five per cent of the receipts to go to the German Relief Fund. As a result of the advertising there was a big turnout of German citizens, some of whom did not understand clearly just the circumstances under which the theater was being opened on Sunday.

Mayor Thomas Bauer, who is a German, sent word that if the doors of the theater were so much as opened he would send a squad of police and raid the place. Manager Maurice feared bloodshed might result, knowing the temper of the Germans who had assembled. He feared that before it could be explained some of the crowd might get an idea that the police action was an anti-German action, and stand up for the Fatherland. So the doors were not opened and it was announced to the crowd that no attempt would be made to give the show. The purpose was to have given the case a trial in the courts, and carry it as high as necessary to determine the law on the subject.

The exhibitors in Goshen, which is but ten miles from Elkhart, will make an effort to keep open Sundays. They anticipate no trouble, as the Elkhart case tried in the county court failed to convict Clifford Cole, and any Goshen case would go to the same court.

INDIANA BRIEFS.

Leopold Dryfus is to build a theater in Lafayette, Ind., to replace the old Dryfus theater, which was burned.

Mr. Dryfus proposes to replace the theater with an office building, but was persuaded by citizens to reconsider, and a movement is on foot now to raise $25,000 by the sale of $25 seats for the first show in order to make it possible to provide Lafayette with a theater. The building will cost $100,000 and Mr. Dryfus signified his willingness to spend $75,000 and give up the office building idea if the proposed plan went through.

Shelbyville is going out of the theater business. The Indiana town, home of the Rembusch mirror screen, has been renting the town hall on a percentage business. One of the recent checks, after paying the war tax on the hall, left twenty-eight cents.

Raymond Anderson, of the Standard Film Company, Chicago, is to "film" New Albany, Ind., streets and industries.

Fred Badt, of the Star theater, Hartford City, Ind., is having a stage constructed in his house and will give vaudeville hereafter in addition to pictures.

The exhibitors in New Castle are a prosperous lot. Recently this Indiana town was visited by a capitalist who wanted to buy a house from some one, and he didn't find an exhibitor who wanted to name a price on his place. Neither did he find a vacant room in the town that could be rented for the purpose of putting in a show.

A stunt that paid well was put on by F. J. Rembusch at Shelbyville, Ind. Charlie Chaplin's double went about the streets of Shelbyville doing stunts and incidentally advertising "Tillie's Punctured Romance," in which the real Chaplin appeared at the Alhambra theater.

DETROIT TO BEGIN CENSORING AGAIN.

Police Commissioner Gillespie has decided to recommence the censorship of motion pictures within a short time, on the complaint of the Detroit Federation of Women's Clubs, who say that motion picture theaters are violating the law in allowing children under 14 to attend performances after 8 P. M. and by showing salacious films. If it is definitely decided to renew censorship, it will become effective May 1st.

FILMS ON SECOND FLOORS.

Another effort to have the Michigan legislature authorize the showing of moving pictures in halls above the ground floor in fireproof buildings is contained in a bill introduced April 2 by Senator Robert Y. Ogg, of Detroit. The bill is said to have the backing of the Ford Motor Company, Detroit, which desires to add moving pictures to its educational course for employees, but is barred from showing them in the modern fireproof Ford company factory because of the ground floor provision of the present law. A similar bill, introduced in the house by George P. Palmer, of Detroit, aiming to give the Detroit Y. M. C. A. the privilege of showing film in its second floor hall, was defeated in the house some time ago.

A GOOD CASHIER.

The right kind of a cashier is just as important to a moving picture theater as any other department. By reason of the fact they are coming in contact with thousands of people every day, personality with a moving picture theater cashier is of greater importance than with a cashier in the ordinary position. Of all the theaters in Detroit, there are mighty few that have the same cashier for any length of time, but there is one exception, and that is at the New Empire theater, 189 Woodward avenue, owned by A. J. Gillingham and managed by Mr. Smith. The young lady cashier's name is Miss Anna Figge, who has held down that position since the house opened, three years ago. Miss Figge has a charming personality, a very pleasant smile and is liked by every patron of the Empire. While there are probably few who know her by name, there are thousands who know her face and who miss her when she is away. As an example, last summer when she was absent for a few days on account of sickness, any number of patrons would inquire for her. She is always alert to her duties and she always minds her own affairs and attends strictly to business. "Miss Figge is the personification of perfection as a cashier," said Manager Smith. "In all the years that I have been connected with theaters I have never found or met a more trustworthy and dependable cashier."

DETROIT BRIEF ITEMS.

At the elections on Monday, April 5, two counties in Michigan voted in favor of Sunday shows, which means that moving picture theaters will be allowed to operate. These counties are Owosso and Washtenaw.

So successful was the run of "The Eternal City" at the Washington that Mr. Kunsky, lessee of the house, decided to play it a second week. The engagement concluded on April 17.

The Maxine theater, Kercheval and Baldwin avenues, managed by E. V. McGrath, is now getting out a weekly program, with a different cover each week in two colors.

A. Carlos, general representative for the William Fox Film Corporation, was in Detroit on April 7.

The Scenic Theater Company, Detroit, which proposes to erect a 2,200 seating capacity theater at Warren and Chene streets, has incorporated for $1,000. The stockholders are Alexander Cannell, Geo. C. Hupp and Arthur Thomas

Michigan Theaters Corporation Growing and Prosperous—President Blankmeyer Has Arranged for Seventy-five Days' Bookings—Sixty-five Members Now in the Organization—Interest in Other States—Seems to Be Filling a Need.

By Jacob Smith, Detroit Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

MANAGER A. W. BLANKMEYER, of the Grand Circus theater, Detroit, as well as president and general manager of the Michigan Theaters Corporation, organized for the purpose of aiding exhibitors in getting films direct from the producer, told a representative of the Moving Picture World that already seventy-five days' bookings had been arranged for and that the number was being increased steadily. Mr. Blankmeyer says that so far the association has sixty-five members and that at least one or two new ones were being added every day. The association has a man on the road interviewing exhibitors, and his letters to the office indicate that he has yet to meet with a turn-down after he has presented the proposition. In response to the article in the World two weeks ago relative to the organization, Mr. Blankmeyer has received at least two dozen letters from exhibitors in other parts of the country asking for further information, full particulars and advice as to how they should go about it to organize a similar association. In fact, Mr. Blankmeyer says it is going to be such a big proposition that he has decided to issue a prospectus which he will mail to exhibitors in other sections of the country who may be interested. It will outline completely the Detroit proposition. The Corporation has had printed the by-laws which have been mailed to all members. It will likely take at least another thirty days before the organization will be in actual working order.

F. L. GARDINER RECOVERING.

F. L. Gardiner, manager of the Detroit Theater Equipment Co., who recently underwent an operation for appendicitis, is recovering slowly. This company reports a good business on Powers 6-A machines. It recently placed two with the Majestic theater and the Broadway-Strand. Besides handling a full assortment of moving picture supplies, the company also maintains a general repair department.

ARTONE FILM INCORPORATED.

The Artone Film Company of Detroit has incorporated for $100,000 to "buy, sell and rent and produce motion picture films and accessories." The principal stockholders are Willard H. Goodfellow, Francis Reno, William C. Canfield and August Froebel. The company will be film distributors and in addition will make moving pictures, full announcement of which will be made later. Suffice it to say that some of the best experienced men in the industry are connected with this new enterprise. Mr. Goodfellow was one of the first in the country to make moving picture films, and was a pioneer in the film exchange business in Detroit. Mr. Reno until recently was manager of the Detroit office of the Pathescope Sales Company. He also has spent many years in the moving picture industry in all branches. Mr. Froebel was formerly with the St. Louis Motion Picture Corporation and other well known companies. The Artone Film Company has taken an entire floor at 79 Woodward avenue.

IRONS MANAGES THE NORWOOD

H. W. Irons, former manager of the Washington and other Kunsky theaters, and who recently was manager of the William Penn in Pittsburg for John P. Harris, has returned to Detroit and will manage the new Norwood theater at Woodward and the Boulevard, which is getting ready to open about May 1. The house will accommodate 700 people, and is being built by Charles Rall, a leading confectioner, who says he will aim to make it one of the prettiest theaters for its size in the city.

TWO NEW THEATERS OPEN.

On April 11 the Broadway-Strand was opened to the public. There was a private exhibition on Saturday evening, April 10, invitations having been extended to exhibitors, exchange men, newspaper men and personal friends. The New Knickerbocker theater at Jefferson and the Belle Isle bridge approach, operated by Messrs. Ingersoll and Gaulker, was opened on Saturday evening, April 10. Full account of both events will appear in our next issue.

BEGIN NEW KUNSKY THEATER.

Ground was broken on April 1 for the new theater to be erected by John H. Kunsky, at Grand River avenue and Fourteenth street. It is planned to have the theater completed and ready to open by August 15. It will seat 1,600 people and will be more beautiful than the company's latest theater, the Alhambra, Woodward and Kenilworth avenues, which has been considered the "last word" in moving picture theater construction. This west side theater will have a main floor and a balcony and will cost $150,000. It will have a pipe organ and there will also be music by a symphony orchestra. C. Howard Crane, who has designed all of the Kunsky theaters, is the architect, and Frank Farrington, the builder. The location of this new theater certainly shows excellent judgment on the part of Mr. Kunsky. It is a logical site for a residential theater, as it taps practically the entire west side and yet is in the heart of the west side business district.

The Garden theater, owned by John H. Kunsky and under the management of Arthur Hoganson, has just adopted a new policy—that of showing first-run Paramount subjects. This is the first time in the history of Detroit that a residential theater has booked first-run pictures. That the plan is proving successful is evidenced by the increased attendance at the Garden since the arrangement has become known in that section.

MILES-DETROIT DIVIDEND.

The directors of the Miles-Detroit Theater Company, Detroit, have declared a dividend of 3 per cent. for the first quarter of 1915, payable to stockholders of record of April 10. It is understood that there will be a substantial surplus remaining in the treasury after the disbursement. Including the dividend now declared, the company has paid 16 per cent. since Jan. 1, 1914.

NEW SCHMIED-SISSMAN HOUSE.

Architects, the Fuller-Claflin Co., have let, for the Grand Boulevard Theater Co., the general contract for a duplex theater on East Grand Boulevard, near Woodward avenue, to the Schmied-Sissman Co. The ground is being cleared of the houses on the property to prepare for the excavation.

WILLIAM KLATT TO BUILD.

Plans are nearly completed for the theater, store and office building to be erected by William Klatt, of the Detroit Theaters, Inc., which is to be erected on Woodward avenue, near the boulevard, at a cost of $100,000. It is to be known as the Regent theater. There will be five stories and a basement, the size of the structure being 107 by 160 feet.

Consolidate Exchanges

San Francisco Sees Beginning of Movement to Concentrate Exchange Business—Purchase of Kleine Interests by Sol. Lesser and All Star Exchange—Puts Combination in Strong Position—Other Deals of the Same Kind Looked For.

By T. A. Church, San Francisco Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

ONE of the most interesting transactions that has taken place in local film exchange circles for many months is the purchase by Sol Lesser, president of the Golden Gate Film Exchange, Inc., and the All Star Feature Distributors, Inc., of the George Kleine interests in California, Nevada and Arizona, this being the territory covered from the San Francisco office. The deal includes all past and future releases and it is the intention to conduct the business through a separate department of the All Star Feature distributors. The offices of the George Kleine Attractions in the Pacific building will be maintained, for a time at least, and Manager Tom North is to continue in his present capacity, to the gratification of his many friends in the trade.

This transaction is the first of what will probably be a series of consolidations, it being known that several similar deals are now under way to reduce the number of exchanges in this city. More than twenty are still in operation and it is felt that the field is overcrowded. The purchase of the Kleine business in this territory by the Lesser interests places the latter in an especially strong position with a number of splendid attractions now being freely booked and with a long line of releases promised.

Mr. D. H. Bergh, of the home office of the George Kleine Attractions, arrived here a short time ago to attend to the details of the transfer of the local branch and will visit the other coast and western offices before returning home. He will leave shortly for Seattle, but expects to return by way of the Exposition City.

SCREEN CLUB TO INCORPORATE.

Work is being rushed on the permanent quarters of the Screen Club of San Francisco in the Tivoli theater building and these are to be formally opened to club members on April 8. The entertainment and dance will be held at a date to be selected later. At the first meeting the election of officers will take place and the club will then file artices of incorporation in order that its business affairs may be propery carried on. Many applications for membership are now being received and others are expected when the new home is ready for occupancy.

WHAT IS A FEATURE OFFERING?

The question of what constitutes a feature production will probably be thoroughly thrashed out in a local court at an early date when the case of the World Film Corporation vs. the Turner & Dahnken Circuit is called. Some months ago the latter concern contracted to take a service feature film production from the World Film Corporation for the Tivoli theater and other houses on its circuit, but now seeks to have this annulled on the ground that the standard of the productions offered has not been maintained. It is alleged that in a number of instances it has been found necessary to place subjects on the shelf and secure others to run in its circuit of houses at a heavy expense. Notice was recently served that in the event of other subjects being found unavailable for use they would not be paid for and it is to enforce payment for these that suit has been brought. The case is expected to arouse considerable interest, as it will hinge largely upon what actually constitutes a feature film.

It is quite certain that the average spectator doesn't consider a dull eight-reel picture a real feature offering. A first-class one-reeler is a feature to most.

OTHER SAN FRANCISCO NOTES.

"The Clansman" has established a record for moving picture performances here, having run for six consecutive weeks at the Alcazar.

James Slevin, of San Jose, Cal., who secured moving pictures of Pope Benedict some time ago, is preparing to leave shortly for Europe to secure war pictures, after visiting the Pope. Pictures of the official life in the Vatican are to be shown in San Francisco on April 19 and 20 in the new Civic Center Auditorium which seats 12,000 persons.

ILLINOIS NEWSPAPER ASKS FOR CRITICISMS OF PROGRAMS

Evanston News-Index Hopes to Bring Patrons and Exhibitors Closer.

By Frank H. Madison, Illinois Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

SOME method should be found whereby photoplay patrons could express their ideal programs for the guidance of exhibitors and producers, says the editor of the News-Index at Evanston.

"There is a popular belief current that there isn't much to choose from in the matter of motion picture programs; that not much can be expected for ten or fifteen cents; that the audiences should not be too critical; and that, altogether, the pictures might be much worse." He explains that "it is a mistake for the motion picture patron to go to the theater in a humble state of mind, because he pays so little for admission there. Motion picture actors are a well-paid class of men and women. They are capable, many of them, of doing rather effective and artistic work. * * * The picture manufacturers are not putting out the sort of pictures that are seen in most picture playhouses as a matter of economy. They think they are suited to the public taste and they seem to reflect the wishes of the people because crowds go to see them. * * * One only has to go to the playhouse which draws from a neighborhood of fairly refined people to be assured that the inferior pictures are accepted as a disagreeable but necessary accompaniment of the pictured program. * * * The Hoyburn theater in Evanston serves this sort of community. Its management, we believe, wishes to present programs of the highest character. The difficulty lies in a misapprehension of the demands of the public on the part of the management, and a failure on the part of the patrons to appreciate what they might have if their wishes were made known." The paper has thrown open its columns to find what people like and dislike in pictures.

SNAP SHOTS AT PROGRAMS.

Spring styles in programs reveal many novelties, but several of the fall and winter creations are still wearing well. The Vogue at Lincoln had a whole feature week, including such sure-fire attractions as "The Spoilers" and "The Stain." Uden's opera house at Flanagan was filled to see who had been caught on the streets by a camera man. "From Sheep to Wearer" was an interesting clothing industrialog to patrons of the Gem at Altamont. The Lyric at Belleville keeps its patrons' minds on the show by taking care of their bundles. Certain Saturday afternoons are set apart for free shows to pupils of certain rural schools by the Lyric at Winchester. Those in Pekin who saw "The Battle of the Sexes" two months ago did the advertising for its return to the Court. The Star at Barry aimed at the proud parents of the town with a baby show. When the Civic Improvement League at Quincy talked of bettering local conditions Manager W. L. Busby of the Empire-Hippodrome offered to show pertinent pictures. The Princess at Percy has been featuring a vocal quartet. The Odd Fellows lodge showed "Samson" at the opera house in Genoa. Shelbyville saw its first made-at-home films through the enterprise of the Yale. The Vaudette at Sterling exhibited the Sterling Rock Falls moving pictures. The Idylhour at Canton is three years old and impressed the fact with a special program. The Court at Pekin is trying different programs for its Sunday matinees and evening shows. Springfield houses will help in a clean-up movement by running educational slides. Chief Red Fox, a Carlisle graduate, gave patrons of the Amuse-U at Carbondale an illustrated lecture on Indians. The Equal Suffrage Society of Peoria handled the ticket sale for "Your Girl and Mine" at the Duchess. The Globe at Monticello was the mecca for Woodmen who wanted to see the film showing the lodge's anti-tuberculosis work. Two boys in Dundee got passes to the Gem for finding mistakes in Manager Windt's ads. Every child in Canton who wrote "Decidedly Distinctive Kriterion" on a slip of paper and handed it to Manager Kuchan saw a Saturday show at the Idylhour free. Springfield Boy Scouts blazed a trail for their families to the Princess to see the scout film. The Capitol at Pekin has secured J. J. Jacobs to give sound effects for the pictures. Telephone girls in Kewanee were the guests of Chris Taylor at a "Runaway June" show at Dreamland. The Empress and a motorcycle dealer at Galesburg worked together in advertising the serial, "The Black Box." A black box was built over a machine which was sent about the city. Waukegan Woodmen got the proceeds when the Barrison showed their special film. Kewanee residents who find their names in the want ad. columns of a local paper get tickets to the Olympia, Willard, Majestic or Dreamland. Special musical programs are given three days a week at the New Star in Clinton by Heffley's orchestra. The Citizens' committee at Springfield chartered three houses, the Princess, Vogue and Pekin, for certain days so it could get voters where they could be addressed on municipal campaign issues. Manager Wilson of the Orpheum at Canton ran nine shows on Dollar Day, the local merchants giving tickets to all purchasers.

Scott Gippert of Rock Island has reopened the Crystal at Milan.

B. W. Fuller sold the Crystal at Glasford to G. A. Rice of Kewanee.

Agreement between the West theater and the union operators at Galesburg has been reached.

Walter Frederich has booked the Paramount service for six days a week at the Capital in Pekin and Sunday will be left for theatrical attractions.

Fire destroyed the town hall and Masonic temple at Lyndon. Francis Dirr s picture outfit was consumed.

ABOUT NEW ORLEANS.

Philip Foto, at present operating three picture theaters in New Orleans, has a deal on for the lease of the whole lower floor of the Crescent Hall Building, at St. Charles and Canal streets, for the purpose of opening a new picture house. The location is considered excellent for the purpose, and it is believed that all arrangements will go through.

The home of J. E. Pearce, southern manager for the Pearce interests, was used by the Fox Film Corporation recently for certain scenes from "Wormwood," which the feature company is producing in New Orleans. Mr. Pearce has been co-operating with Marshall Farnum, director of the producing company, in every manner possible.

K. A. Bugbee, manager, and Maurice F. Barr, road man, for the World Film's New Orleans office had an idea the other day. The New Orleans police department being busy preparing the program for the benefit performance which the department was giving for St. Alphonsius Orphan Asylum, the building of which was recently demolished by a storm, Messrs. Barr and Bugbee tendered two of their one-reel comedies, featuring Richard Carle and Jeff. D'Angelis, for the benefit of the good cause. Superintendent of Police James W. Reynolds thanked the World for their pictures.

The Stuck Moving Picture Company's house at Newelton, La., was destroyed by fire last week. Operator Easter was painfully burned but none of the spectators were injured.

New Orleans' film credit exchange will be formally organized at a meeting, the date of which will be set shortly. It is desired to have every film exchange in the city represented—hence the slight delay in calling the meeting.

Picture Makers Welcome

New Orleans Commissioner of Parks Refused Permission to Out-of-Town Producer to Take Scenes from "Wormwood" in City Park—His Action Not Popular and a Protest by the Association of Commerce Followed.

Special to Moving Picture World from Trades Press.

THE New Orleans Association of Commerce, through General Manager Walter Parker, took up, April 5th, with the City Park Commission the matter of that body's refusal to allow scenes for "Wormwood," William Fox's production, to be filmed in City Park. As a result of the association's mediation in the matter, it is expected that the Board of Commissioners will withdraw their tentatively established censorship and join the rest of the city in welcoming producing companies.

The letter follows:

"Board of Commissioners,
"City Park,
"New Orleans, La.

"Gentlemen:

"Mr. Marshall Farnum, director of the Fox Film Company, upon whom I called to learn the nature of the scenes he desired to film in City Park (permission to do so having been refused him by the City Park Board), has given me the attached excerpt from his scenario.

"I have discussed the matter at length with him, and I fail to see any reason why he should not be permitted to take these scenes, and for that reason I am taking the matter up with you.

"Mr. Farnum tells me that the City Park Board's representative to whom he applied for permission refused the permission under a misapprehension; that the representative did not hear what he had to say, and that the scenario covering the scenes he desires to take in City Park was not read to him.

"I am convinced that the City Park offers the greatest possible opportunities to the moving picture making concerns. He himself has brought the company to New Orleans for the express purpose of taking pictures of the French Quarter and of City Park. If he is not permitted to take these scenes (that is 38, 40 and 42) in City Park, he will move his company to Jacksonville and go ahead with his work.

"I am informed that if the word goes out among the moving picture producing companies that the City Park Board objects to moving pictures being taken there, that the producers will cease to attempt to use New Orleans on a big scale.

"I hope you will reconsider the matter and permit the Fox Film Company to take these pictures.

"As time is limited, this company's arrangements permitting it to remain in New Orleans for only two or three days, an early answer would be very much appreciated. Yours very truly,

"WALTER PARKER,
General Manager."

A copy of this letter was sent to Mayor Martin Behrman also.

E. B. SMITH GOES TO DALLAS.

E. B. Smith, New Orleans manager for the Mutual, has been transferred to Dallas where he will be in charge of the Mutual exchange. Mr. Smith was formerly in Dallas for the Consolidated and will be at home there with old friends. Mr. J. Augur, recently from New York, succeeds Mr. Smith at New Orleans.

PARAMOUNT OFFICES CHANGES.

E. C. Kirkpatrick, recently of the Dallas office of the Southern Paramount, has succeeded Louis E. Loeb in charge of the New Orleans Paramount office. Mr. Loeb has been recalled to the New York office of the Paramount Pictures Company; when he came here it was understood that he was acting for the New York office and that he was sent to New Orleans for a short period only to put Paramount publicity for the exhibitor into effect in the New Orleans territory, as well as elsewhere. This he did.

DAR GOES YO LUMBER COMPANY.

The voudou superstition, recently noted in a film play by the Coquille Film Company, has come into the films again, but this time in deadly earnest. Tom Johnson, the black devotee of voudouism, was recently awarded $7,500 in a damage suit brought by him against a lumber company, and the lumber company appealed the case. Counsel for the lumber company, believing that Johnson was faking the internal injuries which he claimed to have sustained while at work for the lumber company, had an agent advise him to consult a "hoodoo doctor" in Mobile as to how to proceed to win the case in the higher court. Arrived in Mobile, Johnson was advised by the man of magic to make a pilgrimage up a certain creek until he should come to two certain logs; these logs, too heavy for any but a physical giant to lift, he was to raise and cast far into the stream, saying: "Dar goes yo', lumbah company." Johnson did this, and a moving picture machine secreted in the brush nearby recorded the fact for lumber company's counsel. The films will be offered in evidence.

NEW THEATER IN MONTGOMERY.

Hix and Grevely, moving picture exhibitors of Montgomery, Ala., at present operating the Empress and Orpheum theaters, will, it is learned, build a $60,000, 1,500-seat house in the Alabama city. The new house will take in the Empress theater and a drug store adjoining; it will, it is said, be known as the Strand, the last word in picture theaters for the general territory and one of the very finest and biggest houses in the entire south. The officers of the company are W. T. Hix, president; J. C. Grevely, vice-president; A. B. Meyer, secretary-treasurer; directors: Sylvian Baum, Judge Charles B. Teasley.

One of the advanced features of the new house will be its lobby, which will be thirty-five feet wide and of a slightly greater depth. The office will be on one side, and on the other a women's rest room; this latter feature is comparatively untried in the all-picture house, but the best is just barely good enough for Hix and Grevely's people, so a rest room there will be, and neither care nor expense will be spared in making it comfortable and attractive.

The ventilation will be supplied by a system which has recently come into notice as giving the highest satisfaction in this regard. Ample emergency exits will be supplied. Just what music the new house will have has not yet been announced, but it is stated that it will include a very large pipe organ. The work will be begun at an early date and rushed to completion as rapidly as possible.

GULF STATES NOTES.

Pearce is filling his Tudor with "Hypocrites," at twenty-five cents a throw. This price is extraordinary, twenty cents being the usual limit, but the crowds are coming just the same. The production is a Bosworth feature released through Paramount.

"Neptune's Daughter," featuring Annette Kellermann, is announced for Klaw & Erlanger's Crescent, opening Easter Sunday for one week. Pavlowa, the great Russian, is dancing at K. & E.'s Tulane right next door, at $2.50 a seat, also opening the engagement Easter Sunday.

Operate on Theater

St. Louis Famous Theater, One of Oldest Picture Houses in City, Has Been a Sufferer for Some Months—Architects Are Performing an Operation to Relieve Congestion—Will Double Capacity.

By A. H. Giebler, St. Louis Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE Famous Theater, at 615 Franklin avenue, is being treated for one of the most beneficent diseases that can afflict an amusement enterprise, enlargement of the audience.

The house showed unmistakable symtoms of acute incapacity several months ago. The condition was thought to be of a temporary character at the time, but the attack was repeated at frequent intervals until the trouble became chronic. Excision of the back was decided upon, an operation which necessitated the removal of the rear wall to the building line at the alley, and the installation of four hundred additional seats and an up-to-date cooling system was decided on. The improvements to the Famous will increase the seating accommodations of the house from three to seven hundred.

The Famous is one of the oldest moving picture theaters in St. Louis and enjoys a further distinction in the fact that it is owned and operated by a young girl. Miss Tillie Schwartz, the owner of the house, received it from her father, a well known Franklin avenue merchant, as a present. Miss Schwartz gives the theater her personal attention, occupies the box office during the rush hours, takes great care of every detail of the management, and is very proud of the fact that the place has become too small to accommodate its audiences, under her management. The Famous is one of the few theaters in this part of the country that features the actor-behind-the-screen talking pictures. Harry Strickland and Marie Cook, both well known actors on the regular stage, do the talking, and they manage to give an artistic turn to their work that has kept their act on at the Famous long after the talking pictures have been abandoned at other theaters. The Famous is in the heart of the down-town shopping district, and maintains a continuous 10 A. M. to 11 P. M. program, showing five reels, which include three serials a week, for five cents admission. Miss Schwartz, the manager, is a tireless worker for the upbuilding of the motion picture industry, and is the financial secretary of the Theater Managers and Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, which was organized here recently.

PATHE'S NEW MANAGER.

Arthur S. Abeles, who has been appointed by Pathe Freres, as manager of their St. Louis offices, at 3610 Locust street, to fill the vacancy created by the resignation of E. W. Dustin, has taken charge of the exchange. Mr. Abeles says that he found the business to be moving forward nicely and everything in a pleasing and promising condition, and the outlook for future business very good. Mr. Abeles comes here from the Pathe Exchange, in New York, and is somewhat of a stranger in this part of the country.

ASKS AUDIENCE TO CRITICISE.

George E. Kern, manager of the Cherokee, one of the large South Side theaters, situated on Cherokee street, at Ohio avenue, is distributing a handsomely printed card containing the program of feature pictures booked at the theater a month in advance. The program is printed on heavy stock, can be hung up for ready reference, and has spaces intended to be marked by the patrons of the theater with their criticism of the features viewed. The program also has a coupon at the end that may be detached and is good for an admission to the Cherokee. This theater lately replaced a portion of its dramatic stock and tabloid musical comedy program with Paramount features.

ROETTGER TO OPEN AIRDOME.

August Roettger, owner of the Fairy theater and airdome at 5640 Easton avenue, is building an ornamental entrance to the airdome that will be a very handsome structure and will beautify the street as well. Mr. Roettger's residence, which adjoins the theater, sets well back in the yard, the airdome is directly behind the theater, and it is necessary to pass through the Roettger yard to get to it. The new entrance, which faces on Easton avenue, is a large room pavilion, built on the order of a Roman portico, open on all four sides. It is built of plaster and stucco, has a green tile roof, and is ornamented with decoration in bas relief on the inside walls. This pavilion serves as a gateway to a long path which runs between thirty-two eight-feet columns, each topped with a large solar ball electric globe, leading to the airdome, as the path passed through the Roettger yard, where there are trees and flowers, the effect will be very pleasing.

ST. LOUIS BRIEFS.

The Strand, at Sixth and Charles street, St. Louis, is advertising Paramount features, with a full sized billboard on wheels. It is mounted and attracts much attention as it is driven slowly through the downtown streets.

The building at 1419 Cass avenue has been remodeled and opened as the Cass theater, with Fred Pittraff as manager. A five-reel program is used, five cents admission is charged on week days, ten cents on Sundays and souvenirs are given to all ladies attending the show on Friday night.

The Bremen theater, at Twentieth and Bremen avenue has changed hands and is advertising that after April 5 prices will be five cents, with the exception of Sunday, when ten cents will be charged.

Rudolph Meyer, the night watchman at the Palace, operated by Scherer Bros., at 1310 Franklin avenue, frustrated the attempts of burglars who tried to rob the safe at the Palace at 12 o'clock on the night of April 5.

JACKSONVILLE NEWS LETTER.

By Leon Louiso, Jacksonville Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THE Florida Motion Picture Producing Co., "Hamilton" pictures, will show the first of the series of local pictures boosting the proposed "Florida State Fair," Jacksonville.

Caroline Davies and Joe Murr have been entertaining the patrons of the ever popular Imperial theater.

McTallman, manager of the Grand, at Orlando, Fla., has leased the Lucerne, which was a legitimate show house, and will convert it into a theater for pictures. He will use a feature program. The Consolidated Film & Supply Co., of this city, sold him a new Powers 6-A projection machine.

Mr. J. R. Barton, manager of the Universal local office, will leave for a trip throughout the state to visit some of the theaters using Universal service. It has become necessary for the Universal representatives in Georgia and Florida to purchase a new program and hereafter they will double the number of prints they have formerly used. The picture, "The Hard Punch," made by Universal, featuring Jess Willard, is greatly in demand and the local office finds it difficult to meet the many calls from throughout the territory.

Mr. R. G. Matthews, who was formerly with the Mutual service at Charlotte, N. C., has accepted the position of supervistor of bookings at the office of the Consolidated Film Company here.

Frank Shine will open a colored theater at Fernandina soon.

The Palace theater here is showing Universal pictures and is having good business. The theater caters to colored patrons. M. H. Bedez is the manager.

C. W. Morton, who was recently with the Lubin Company here, is now with the Florida Motion Picture Co. in the capacity of technical director.

H. J. Robinson, manager of the Rex, of Fernandina, Fla., was in the city recently.

IN SOUTHERN STUDIOS.

Wilmouth Merkyl has just finished in the three-part Kalem picture, "Wife For a Wife," and has returned to New York City.

M. Regina Richards, who played opposite Mr. Merkyl in the picture, has returned to New York. She will go into one of the big musical shows which will open there in a few weeks.

John Mackin, a member of the Kalem stock, worked in an interesting and rather exciting scene, in which a rattlesnake, securing momentary liberty, bites him on the arm and from the results of which he later dies. The fangs had just been previously removed and poison was still issuing from the fang cavities, but the scene was taken, and no harm resulted.

Myrtle Tannehill, who just finished a Broadway engagement, with William Collier and George M. Cohan, has arrived for a picture at the Kalem studio here. Mr. Kenean Buel will direct the picture. The picture will be one of the "Broadway Feature" series, being produced by the Kalem Co.

Guy Coombs has finished the two-reel Civil War picture, "War's Devastation," in which there are some big battle scenes, and he has commenced work on another picture. The new picture is a story of present day life. The title is "Fate's Checkerboard." Miss Anna Nilsson plays opposite Mr. Coombs, Miss Marjorie Cohen, a local girl, daughter of a member of the film of Cohen Bros., who operate the well known department store here, plays a part in the picture and her work seems very promising. Mr. Ben Ross and Mary Taylor Ross are also in the cast.

Arthur D. Hotaling has finished up the first of the comedy pictures here with the well known stage comedian, Billy Reeves, and Mae Hotely. He has now started the second of the pictures since his return from Philadelphia, where the first Reeves comedies were taken .

The Dyreda Company, in which Howard Estabrook and Miss Laura Sawyer play the principal parts, are making some scenes at Atlantic Beach, Fla., near Jacksonville, under the direction of Director J. Searle Dawley.

In the company with Sid Olcott are Adele Ray, Dora M. Adams and Irene Hawley, who was with the Biograph for three years. Bradley Barker is playing leads. William Scully is assistant director and Emmet Williams who was cameraman for Mary Pickford, is with the company.

ATLANTA NEWS LETTER.

By A. M. Beatty, Atlanta Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

A charter has been asked for the Laymen's Missionary Film Co., by Dr. Marion Hull, Dr. Charles A. Rowland and W. E. Newell, all of Atlanta. In the petition to the superior court, it is stated that the company proposes to deal generally in motion picture films. Dr. Hull states the company already has fifty thousand feet of film taken in China, Japan and Korea by Dr. Rowland showing the work of the missionaries. The films are to be leased and the proceeds used for missionary work.

Frank Montgomery, of Jacksonville, Fla., and Asheville, N. C., was a visitor in Atlanta during the week.

B. Lee Smith, manager of the Strand theater, gave the inmates of the Federal Prison a treat Sunday. Mr. Smith gave a moving picture entertainment composed entirely of masterpieces. Twenty-one convicts from Alabama who spent their first Sunday in the big prison and saw the entertainment, doubtless thought the Federal Prison was not such a bad place to sojourn at after all.

A picture, every scene of which was made in Georgia, principally Augusta and surrounding territory, is being shown this week at the Grand theater. It is a Fox feature and known as "From the Valley of the Missing."

The Atlanta Journal is giving an exhibition of war moving pictures at the Lyric during this ewek. They are the same moving pictures which had a six weeks' run at Carnegie hall in New York, and which prompted wide comment by the advocates of peace.

MANAGER WATKINS ENTERTAINS WASHINGTON CHILDREN.

Four hundred children from the various orphan and foundling asylums of the city were the guests on Saturday morning last of Manager Harry W. Watkins, of the Casino, and Marie Eline, the "Thanhouser Kid." Mrs. Josephus Daniels, wife of the secretary of the navy, was the children's patroness. As she entered the theater with her secretary the orchestra played "Dixie" and the enthusiasm began. A full performance was given for the benefit of the youngsters, including the little play "Springtime," in which little Miss Eline appears. After the performance Mrs. Daniels spoke to the children. She was followed by Mary Eline and later the children formed in line and marched up on the stage, where they shook hands with the two. Mr. Watkins promises to give more such performances for the benefit of those children who seldom have the opportunity of seeing a theatrical performance.

GIVE SHOW IN THE JAIL.

In much the same manner J. A. K. Moore and his son, Tom, Fred Henke and Charles Plunkett, all of whom are connected with Moore's enterprises, several performers from local theaters and the entire band and chorus of Kallipolis Grotto of the Mystic Order of the Enchanted Realm, a Masonic organization, gave a motion picture and vaudeville exhibition for the four hundred men and women prisoners at the District jail. A feature of the motion picture exhibition was the reel "It's a Long Way from Tipperary," produced by the Treble Clef Musical Movies Company. Harry Chick, who sings to the pictures at Moore's Garden, sang to this reel, accompanied by Mrs. Chick. The entertainers were taken to the jail in cabs furnished by the Royal Blue Line and the "Seeing Washington" line. The films were furnished by the United Film Service, Washington Film Exchange and the Mutual Film Corporation.

Motion pictures are to be taken of the annual shad bake of the Washington Board of Trade on May 22, at Chesapeake Beach, for use in one of the weekly news services. Several film men belong to this organization.

Also Want to Give Party

Washington, D. C., Picture Men Who Attended the Ball Given in Baltimore by Exhibitors' League of Maryland Came Back Enthusiastic and Think That Capital City Ought Also to Arrange Something of the Kind to Boost Business.

By Clarence L. Linz, Washington Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

THOSE of the Washington members who attended the annual banquet and ball of the Exhibitors' League of Maryland were so enthusiastic over the manner in which that organization handled it, that there is quite a possibility that an attempt will be made to secure similar success in the National Capital. From an educational standpoint the ball of last fall was a marked success, but it is a long way from educational to financial success and exhibitors and exchangemen are somewhat timid about trying such a proposition again. They have, however, picked up many good tips and added to this is the knowledge that there was a vast multitude of people who would have been present last year had they not thought that there was something in the nature of a fake about the attendance of so many highly advertised stars of filmland. These have since learned different and there have been heard many expressions of a desire to again be given an opportunity to meet their favorites at a public reception.

BIJOU REMODELED.

The Southern Amusement Company has about completed the remodeling of the Bijou, operated by them in Greensboro, N. C. The ceiling of the lobby has been raised to a height of about 22 feet, and the whole has been finished in marble with elaborate relief work. The improvements were made at a cost of approximately $1,000. This house is running features daily and is enjoying a very good business. It is under the management of George W. Pryor, a well-known exhibitor.

FILM EXCHANGES MOVE.

The spring fever seems to have caught quite a number of film exchanges, for in addition to the change noted with respect to the Electric Theater Supply Company, three other concerns are contemplating moving to new and larger quarters. Of these the first to make a change will be the Irvine's Feature Film Exchange, now located in the Bank of Commerce and Savings building, which will take possession of its new quarters in the United Film Service building at 903 E street, northwest. This, of course, means that the latter concern is about to give up its present location at 420 Ninth street, northwest. This will be done within the next two weeks upon the completion of the work which will result in the entire remodeling of this large building. The third concern is the World Special Film Corporation, which gives up its present offices on or about May 1, to go into enlarged offices on E street, between Tenth and Eleventh street, northwest.

SEPARATE ENTRANCES.

Another important change is the division of the business of the Greater New York Film Rental Company and the Fox Film Corporation, heretofore conducted jointly, which is scheduled to take place during the coming week. The present plans contemplate the remodeling of the present officers on Ninth street as a result of which separate entrances will be had to each of these exchanges, Lieut. Jim P. Anderson will continue as manager of the local interests of the Fox Film Corporation, with Miss Mary Jeffries as his first assistant. C. F. Senning is to go on the road as traveling representative. As yet, the office force of the Greater New York Film Rental Company has not been announced. Mr. Anderson is to have the territory included in the District of Columbia, Virginia, West Virginia and North Carolina, in each of which he is very well known among the exhibitors. The office will also be promoted, for instead of continuing as heretofore as a branch of the Philadelphia office, from which all shipments have been made, it will now become a buying office and all service will be handled from this end direct.

UNIVERSAL F. & S. CO. ELECTS.

The Universal Film & Supply Company held its annual meeting in Charlotte, N. C., last week. As a result of the election had at that time, the following-named officers have been selected to serve during the ensuing year: T. S. Rucker, of Winston-Salem, president; A. F. Moses, of Winston-Salem, vice-president; E. F. Dardine, of Charlotte, secretary, and R. D. Craver, of Charlotte, treasurer. The following were also elected as members of the board of directors: F. H. Fleer, R. D. Craver, T. S. Rucker, A. F. Moses and Otto Haas. The reports of the officers are said to have indicated that the year has been a very gratifying one to the company and that it was considered that the prospects for the future were exceptionally bright.

SLIDES TO PREACH PEACE.

A group of well-known women, representing the official and social life of the National Capital, have formed The Women's Peace Party with a view of moulding public opinion in such way as to bring about peace among the warring countries of Europe. A part of their program is the use of slides bearing statements and extracts from the speeches of famous men in all walks of life. These they are tendering to motion pictures exhibitors with the request that they be run between shows. Of the Washington houses, Crandall's has already volunteered to render this service. Houses in other cities are being approached in like manner. Mrs. Robert LaFollette, wife of Senator LaFollette, has this section of the organization's work in charge.

GIVES UP LOCAL OFFICE.

The Electric Theater Supply Company has given up its quarters in the Bank of Commerce and Savings Building, where it occupied a suite of offices, and the entire equipment has been returned to Philadelphia. George W. Smiley, formerly the manager of this branch, states that the business will no doubt hereafter be carried on by traveling representatives out from the Philadelphia office. Mr. Smiley tendered his resignation as manager of this branch while on a recent visit to the home office and has since accepted a position as traveling representative with the local Pathe Exchange.

WASHINGTON BRIEFS.

N. J. Hoerrmann, operating the Palace, in Petersburg, Va., was in town looking over the feature offerings.

W. E. Jasper, formerly connected with the General Film Company, visited Washington last week in the capacity of traveling representative of the Greater New York Film Rental Company.

S. L. Harris, owner of the Bonita, in Norfolk, Va., is reported to have purchased the Olympic, in Portsmouth, Va. Harry Church will undertake the management of this house also.

J. H. Henry, of the Empire theater, Winchester, Va., and F. Clifton Cross, of the Crosman theater, Norfolk, Va., were among the week's visitors.

Mayor of Boston Gives Hearing to Negroes Protesting Against Griffith Film—Sees Picture with City Officials, Finds Nothing That Would Give Him Right to Prohibit It—Colored Folk Hiss His Decision.

By Edwin H. McCloskey, New England Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

DESPITE the many protestations of many of Boston's colored residents, against "The Birth of a Nation," the gigantic Griffith production, opened an indefinite engagement at the Tremont theater, Boston, on April 10, playing to capacity houses, both at the matinee and evening performances.

As was announced in the last issue of the World, the Boston branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, of which Mr. Moorfield Storey is the president, had requested a hearing before Mayor James M. Curley, seeking to prevent it.

The mayor granted this hearing. About three hundred prominent negroes and persons interested in the uplift of the colored race were in attendance. David Wark Griffith, the producer, and several members of his staff appeared in favor of the production. Out of the large number of the protestants but three had witnessed the production. The remainder admitted that they were condemning the production from hearsay.

Butler R. Wilson, a colored attorney, handled the case for the protestants. He objected to the scene where a negro named "Gus" is seen chasing a young white girl up a cliff, from which she throws herself to escape from his clutches. The second scene to which the objection was raised is that of a negro lieutenant-governor, who ties a white girl to a chair and gags her because she will not marry him. The third objection was to a scene during the Civil War when a father, mother and young white daughter, together with two Union soldiers are holding a lone farmhouse against a horde of negroes. The final scene shows the father holding a pistol against the young girl's head as the house is attacked by the negroes.

Before hearing the witnesses the mayor read the statute which states that if a play, film or any form of amusement is indecent, immoral or tends to corrupt the public morals, the mayor, with the approval of the police commissioner, may censor the production and then if both find that it is objectionable, the mayor may forbid its production.

Miss Mary White Ovington, a New York settlement worker, said that she had witnessed the production twice in New York City. She claimed to have heard members of the audience state after the production that they would like to murder every "nigger" in the land. She also objected to the low-neck dresses worn by some of the colored women in the production. The mayor informed her that low-neck dresses could be seen in the best of society. She said that she had never been in society, but aside from the dresses the expressions on the faces of these women were awful. The mayor then informed her that the expressions on the faces of several of the characters in the Shakespearian productions could be construed likewise.

Moorfield Storey arraigned the producer, the mayor and the people who stood for the picture. He said: "This picture is for political purposes. It is to discredit the negro all over the country."

The mayor interrupted him and said that the English could enter just such a protest against Shakespeare's "Henry VIII." The mayor then read a letter from an Episcopalian minister, who said that the picture was wonderful. Mr. Storey retorted that if the priests and the priesthood were portrayed in the way this film is alleged to protray the negro, he would have plenty of supporters among the population of Boston to suppress it.

The Rev. Dr. Alexander Mann, rector of Trinity Church, arraigned the book, "The Clansman," from which the play is taken, calling it vindictive, damaging to American citizenship and hurtful to the colored race. He was followed by Joseph Prince Loud, a Boston architect, who claimed to have seen the film in New York. He criticised the display of the activities of the "Klu Klux Klan" and other illicit bodies in the South after the war, which are portrayed in the pictures.

He was reminded by the mayor that history could not be eliminated and that the best way to stop such things would be to stop the printing of histories.

William Munroe Trotter, publisher of a paper devoted to the interests of the colored race, whom President Wilson asserts insulted him in Washington, was the next speaker. In his lengthy speech he told how he had supported Curley for mayor and expected that the mayor would put the ban on the film. Dr. Francis H. Rowley, president of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, was the last speaker for the opposition.

Attorney John F. Cusick opened the case for the Griffith interests by stating that out of 200 persons appearing in opposition to the film but three had seen it. He said that the play shows the people what they are enjoying at the present time in contrast to the past. He also presented the official report of the National Board of Censorship.

He told how the film was first presented in the east room of the White House, before President Wilson and the members of his cabinet. He claimed that they declared it to be wonderful. At this point every negro in the assembly hissed loudly. The mayor rapped his gavel for order and two police officers were required to cause silence. Cusick continued to tell of the distinguished personages in public and private life who had witnessed the production and declared it to be superior to anything that they had ever witnessed. These remarks were also hissed. David Wark Griffith was then introduced. He stated that protestations of this kind would mean that the Indians could protest moving pictures, for in most Western pictures they are depicted killing white men. He read a letter from a Catholic priest connected with the Columbiad, the official Knights of Columbus paper, commending him to the play; also three letters from Catholic clergy in New York wishing to take children of their parish schools to see the production in New York; also six letters from principals of New York educational institutions, who praised the play and wanted their scholars to see it. The mayor then asked him if he would be willing to eliminate the cliff scene and Griffith answered that he would if the official censor thought it advisable after seeing the production.

The mayor then said: "My power is limited in this matter. I do not want to make political capital out of it and I do not want to hurt a legitimate firm doing business. You people seem to want everything pertaining to the negro eliminated from the film. Are there not good negroes and bad? Are there not bad whites as well as good? Do you want the assassination of Lincoln cut out? Why, the white people of the country would protest that. You must remember that history cannot be denied."

At this point the mayor was interrupted by William M. Trotter, who stated that the colored voters had supported the mayor when he was elected to office. The mayor then continued: "This photoplay will be produced in this city. I will have the official censor of the municipality there and I will notify the police commissioner to have his censor there. If this film violates the law it shall be stopped. I shall not take any hand in the matter. You people have stated your case. You have used no evidence that I could use in stopping at least one performance."

The first performance was given on Friday evening to an invited audience, composed of many public officials, theater men, newspaper men and others. The mayor was present and enjoyed the production immensely.

The official censors reported that the production was neither obscene or immoral. However, the mayor requested that many minor changes be made in the film. The statement which he issued follows:

"With the desire that the fullest possible measure of justice be accorded the colored citizenship of Boston, I attended the production last evening and to-day requested the management to eliminate the prefatory statement thrown on the screen at the opening of the performance, believing it unfair to the colored citizenship. The statement in question is as follows: 'The bringing of the African to America in the seventeenth century planted the first seed of disunion.' This request was complied with.

"I requested the elimination of a portion of the chase of the white girl by Gus. I further requested the management to eliminate at least five exhibitions of the face of Gus, to which objection had been made. I further requested certain scenes, while not immoral or obscene, yet might be offensive to certain of the public, descriptive of the visit of Charles Sumner to the home of Austin Stoneman and his meeting with the mulatto woman there be eliminated. I further requested that certain scenes between the mulatto woman and Austin Stoneman and between the mulatto woman and Silas Lynch be eliminated.

"I further requested that portions of the reels portraying scenes in the South Carolina House of Representatives wherein a member is shown removing his shoes and the consideration by such assembly of a motion requiring the member to replace his shoes, be eliminated.

"To these requests the management has assented. In addition thereto the changes made in the original films while exhibiting in New York will be in force in Boston."

MAYOR REFUSES LICENSE TO DORCHESTER PICTURE HOUSE

Sentiment of District Against New Theater—Foolish Objections.

The opposition of 500 residents of Dorchester caused Mayor James M. Curley to refuse a license for a proposed moving picture theater on Dorchester avenue, near Savin Hill avenue, although his honor admitted that the actual arguments presented by them carried little weight with him.

The petitioner for the license was Frederick E. Johnson. Besides him and his attorney, Frederick M. J. Sheanan, only two men appeared in favor of the proposition. During the hearing the Rev. James J. McCarthy, pastor of St. William's Church, Dorchester, asserted that one name appeared on the petition supposed to contain signatures of those favoring the theater, was a forgery. He was the principal objector.

He declared that a picture theater in the district would be a public nuisance and would create an unnatural desire among the children of the neighborhood for excessive amusement. He also said that pictures suggest undesirable topics to the mind of a child.

Attorney Sheanan declared that his petition contained the names of persons in the neighborhood owning $817,000 worth of property. He said: "The people present simply reflect the wishes of one man," evidently referring to Fr. McCarthy.

When Mayor Curley announced his decision, he said: "It is obvious that the sentiment of the district is practically against the building and opening of a moving picture house. I do not approve, however, the character of the argument made here by those opposing the project. I admit that moving pictures have their faults. But so has the stage, but no one here would suggest closing all the theaters in the city. There is a national board of censorship, which I agree, does not always do its duty, requiring me to interefere at times with pictures shown in Boston. But we are gradually moving toward an improvement of moving pictures as well as the stage. The question here, though, is not of the moral influences of the pictures. It is whether or not the people of this particular district want this particular moving picture house.

"In view of the great opposition shown it would have been discretion for the petitoner to have withdrawn his application. Although he has not done so, I believe that he will agree with me that the only way to decide the matter to suit the wishes of the citizens concerned is to refuse to grant the license."

NEW MASSACHUSETTS CHARTERS

The following amusement enterprises were chartered in Massachusetts during the past week:

Metro Pictures Corporation of New England: Oscar Grosberg, Louis Rosenberg and Louis B. Mayer. Capital stock, $5,000.

Victoria Amusement Company, Boston: John A. Arthur, Frank L. Jones and Rachael P. Arthur. Capital stock, $3,000.

Paramount Pictures Corporation of New England, Boston: Hiram Leighton, Florence Leighton and Edwin M. Robinson. Capital stock, $20,000.

Lincoln and Parker Company, moving picture machines, Boston: Frederick H. Leighton, John H. Parker and Frank McKenzie. Capital stock, $100,000.

W. C. T. U. ENDORSES CENSORSHIP.

The state censorship of moving pictures, as proposed in a bill pending before the general court, was endorsed at the mid-winter meeting of the executive committee of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Massachusetts. Mrs. Katherine Lent Stevenson occupied the chair.

PICTURES IN LOWELL.

Six society women of Lowell, Mass., who have been investigating moving picture theaters in their city for the Middlesex Women's Club, report that thirty-two per cent of the films shown here are unnatural, debasing, coarse and vulgar and that on two occasions while they were in the theaters men endeavored to embrace them in the darkness.

NEW ENGLAND BRIEFS.

President Harry E. Aitken, of the Mutual Film Corporation, and his brother, Roy Aitken, were visitors during the week to Manager Winfield Bradley of the New England office.

H. Hirsch, familiarly known to every New England exhibitor as "The Baron," will act as the New England representative of the North American Film Corporation, exploiting their new prize serial, "Diamonds From the Sky." Baron needs no introduction in this territory, having directed the New England destinies of "The Million Dollar Mystery" and "Zudora." He is receiving many inquiries regarding the serial.

Irving Smith, proprietor of Smith's theater, Woonsocket, R. I., reports that features released through United Film Service are well appreciated by his patrons. In fact, he states, that they are writing to him asking about the coming attractions.

A change of policy has been put into effect by Manager Elbridge L. Campbell, of the Majestic theater, Keene, N. H. He has raised his admission price to ten cents and is using three features a week. The new policy is making a tremendous hit with all patrons.

Augusta Pictures?

Augusta, Maine, Board of Trade Has Proposition Before It That May Bring a Picture Producing Company to That City—New York People Are Interested—Will Make Film Under the Brand, "Augusta Motion Picture Company."

By John P. Flannagan, Maine Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

IF negotiations which are now being conducted by the Augusta, Me., Board of Trade are successful, the city may, in the near future, become the headquarters of a moving picture concern, the Sawyer Film Corporation, of New York City. F. H. Tinker of the company was in Augusta a short time ago in connection with the matter and will come again within two weeks, at which time it is considered possible that something definite may be decided upon.

The company would bring to Augusta a complement of from fifty to sixty high salaried people. In addition it would require the services of a great many "extra" people annually for battle, mob scenes, etc., and from an economic standpoint would only employ Augusta people in this capacity. Further, the company would buy a great many of its supplies in Augusta, and as the company would average about fifteen productions per year,

Another important point—the brand of pictures put out by this company would be known as the Augusta brand, produced by the Augusta Motion Picture Co. These films would not only be shown in the majority of moving picture houses in the United States and Canada, but all over the world, and with the brand "Augusta" on each film and on all lithographs, etc., the city would derive advertising advantages second to none.

NEW HOUSE IN BELFAST.

A new picture theater in the Eaton block, on Phoenix Row, Belfast, was opened early this week, and will be on a five-cent basis. Charles B. Eaton, the owner, states that he is doing this, not with the idea of underselling anyone, but because he thinks there is a demand for a five-cent theater here, and thinks he can make it pay, but that if after a certain length of time he finds he cannot do it, he will advance to ten cents. The theater will seat 327 people, is on the street floor, with two double entrances. The seats are comfortable, and Universal service will be given. Kempton Craig will operate the picture machine.

PAYSON SMITH TELLS GOOD CENSOR STORY.

State Superintendent of Schools Payson Smith, of Augusta, speaking before Bangor Women's clubs during the week, expressed a desire for regulation of the moving picture theaters of Maine. He made a plea for co-operation of the women's clubs with the managers. He said that he himself likes to see a good moving picture show, but his enjoyment is often clouded by the fact that in almost every show there is at least one picture that he would not want children to see. He told a story of a woman's club that started a campaign to drive moving picture shows out of the town and then appointed a committee of three members who had never seen a moving picture show, to visit the theaters and report on them. The three members, on visiting the moving picture show, were so fascinated and delighted that they resigned from the club in order that they might become ardent moving picture patrons without conflicting with the sentiments of the club. State Superintendent Smith stated that there are wonderful educational possibilities in the moving pictures.

Beginning Monday, Manager Bibber of Music Hall, Lewiston, started with Paramount pictures. This is due to the passing of two other theaters into stock. There is a demand for these high class photo plays.

SHORTER MAINE NOTES.

One of the most spectacular, most educational and most thrilling pictures ever thrown onto a moving picture screen in Lewiston, was witnessed by crowded audiences at the Mystic theater, Sunday. The picture was "Cabiria," and for two hours held the onlookers in suspense.

The Coast Artillery Corps of the Maine National Guard were filmed while in camp at Fort Williams last summer, and that film can tell better than words just what camp life is like since the First Maine militia regiment became artillery. That film will be shown at the fourth annual military ball, which takes place in Lewiston City Hall next Thursday evening.

FEATURES IN CLEVELAND.

Big Offerings Just Now Are in Demand in the Ohio City.

By J. D. Raridan, Ohio Correspondent of Moving Picture World.

CLEVELAND, with its 170 motion picture theaters, is at this time entering upon an undeniable era of feature film popularity. Every theater is booking at least one feature a week, in addition to the regular program of Mutual, General, Universal, Metro or Kriterion releases. Some are using three or four features a week and ten or twelve are using features exclusively.

For the week of April 11 the leading houses of the city booked pictures vieing for popularity. The Alhambra ran the Universal's submarine set all week, the Knickerbocker with Paramount, Duchess with Metro features and "The Cowboy and the Girl" as its principal offering; Standard, downtown, with "The Christian" as its leading attraction; Reel, downtown, with Paramount and additional features; Dreamland, with Mutual masterpictures—and every one of them making a general bid for Chaplin productions.

The Standard, with its presentation of "The Christian," announces a raise in the price of admission to 25 cents, the first boost of general admission in any Cleveland theater.

VICTORY IN WARREN.

Warren, O., theater managers have won their fight for Sunday shows. Popular acclaim for the operation of shows on Sunday brought the city's officials and police department to a more definite understanding of the elasticity of Ohio's "Blue Laws." It is unlikely that any further effort will be made to exert power in closing theaters on the Sabbath until after the Beal law election to determine the fate of the "dry" movement.

OHIO BRIEFS.

Frank E. Hutchison has sold his interest in the Grand theater, Delaware, O., to Park Byers, who, with Guy Dailey, has formed a partnership.

A. H. Jackson has opened the new Strand theater at Fremont, O., with Carl Miller as house manager. This is regarded as the most complete picture house in Fremont.

"Lay Down Your Arms," the four-reel feature, pointing out the horrors of war, was shown at the Alhambra theater, Cleveland, recently, under the auspices of the Cleveland circles of the Woman's Peace Party. It also had the official sanction of Mayor N. D. Baker, who wrote a prologue which was thrown upon the screen at each presentation of the picture.

Captain C. F. Myers, of the Elyria police department, will start a picture theater, according to plans he hopes to put in operation.

MUTUAL
NOW

With Odds of 100,000 to 1— Will you take a Chance?

They tell me two million people buy this publication; that undoubtedly ten million see it; and that likely a good many thousand read this page.

It's a gaspy sort of feeling you have when you write to so many friends at once. Just think of the ghastly proportions of the wee-est little fib, multiplied ten million times!

You know how it felt when the teacher went out of the room at examination time, saying—"On Honor now, Boys." And how anybody who cribbed while she was gone was more than likely to get his head punched at recess!

Well, writing these pages makes me feel as though the whole ten million of you were teachers,—and had just gone out of the room!

I can't crib!

I promised to tell you the truth about Master-Pictures every week, and here's one I haven't even seen.

Maybe it's just an ordinary moving picture. But do you think the Reliance Motion Picture Corporation,—which produced "The Outlaw's Revenge," "The Outcast" and "A Man and His Mate" in the Master-Picture Series could make an ordinary one? I don't.

Maybe it's badly acted. But do you believe Robert Edeson and Mary Alden, and the rest, would act it badly? I don't.

Before I can get a glimpse of that picture, it will have cost me and my associates a good deal more than a hundred thousand times as much as it will cost you to see it.

Will you take a chance with me? At 100,000 to 1? This Master-Picture is called

A Man's Prerogative.

It is a four reel Reliance production.

It will be shown in a theatre near you this week.

Griffith, the great producer, said to me, "Aitken—it's a fine picture; one of the best; a big subject, handled in a big way. Why, man,"—he said, "It fair burns you to look at it."

But then,—Griffith had seen the picture.

By the time you read this I shall have seen it, too.

How long can you WAIT to see it?

"Take off your hats to your Vice President,— to Captain Macklin, Vice President of Honduras"

Richard Harding Davis is, I suppose, the best news reporter on earth. When you read him you feel, somehow, as though you were there.

At least,—I feel that way.

And I suppose that is one reason "Captain Macklin" makes such a crackling Master-Picture.

It is just facts that happen very, very fast.

From the day he was stripped of his uniform at West Point until the people were cheering him as Vice President of Honduras was less than two months. And, as was every day of the life he led, so every inch of the film that tells it is crowded with action and intrigue and action.

A fine looking young fellow—fresh from West Point; two lovely girls (one just a bit too lovely perhaps), uniforms (some pretty badly battered), Gatlings, half breeds, blazing plazas, the swing and glitter of Romance and War,—doesn't it make your blood tingle to think of it?

You know the prickly feeling that runs up and down your spine when a hundred-piece Regimental Band comes blaring and booming by—even in a parade?

Well,—you feel like that only more so when you go to see

Captain Macklin,—a four reel Majestic,—by Richard Harding Davis.

You can see it most any day now—so watch the newspapers.

And meantime say to your nearest theatre: "I want to see

A Man's Prerogative

Go get this Reliance Master-Picture for your theatre and prepare for big business.

Robert Edeson

supported by some of the cleverest film players in America plays the lead in this big four-reel feature—and "Bob", you know, is some actor. The public knows that, too.

Advertised in

is a story of a highly intelligent woman and a famous lawyer. The woman is of a strong mind, a magazine writer of repute, and believes that she should guide herself by the same standard of morals that governs him. Because of their association with two profligates, complications arise that separate them and cause the man to lose faith in the woman.

It's an old theme, but it's handled in a great big way.

This four-reel Reliance movie is one of the series of Mutual Master-Pictures advertised to over 10 million people.

THE HAUNTED HOUSE OF WILD ISLE (Special—To Parts—April 26).—The ghost of John Miller, a suicide, is said to haunt the house which stands on Wild Isle. Warren Kent, an author, falls in love with Ann, the suicide's daughter. He determines to investigate the haunted house. As he enters the building, a picture falls from the wall. A rifle is shoved through a loophole. Kent drops just in time to escape being shot. Forcing the door, Kent chases his assailant from room to room. He is shot at time and again and finally compelled to retreat when a bullet lodges in his arm. The following night, accompanied by Ann, Kent returns. Ann is clad in a sheet and plays ghost to distract the attention of the other ghost while Warren enters the house.

The plan succeeds. Warren makes his way to the attic just in time to see a white-clad figure aim his rifle at Ann. He engages the "ghost" in a struggle. Ann, unhurt, runs for help. Unknown to the lovers, the girl's guardian, Doctor Truby, has followed them to the island. Truby wishes to marry Ann, to further his own schemes. The doctor enters the building and makes his way to the attic. Warren finds he is struggling with a madman. Levelling a revolver at Warren, Truby orders him to throw up his hands. The young man lunges toward the doctor, throwing the pistol up just as Truby shoots. The bullet misses Warren, but injures the "ghost" in the head.

Ann, accompanied by a number of farmers, arrives upon the scene. Truby is subdued. The "ghost" revives and gazes about dazedly. Seeing Truby, he springs forward and demands an explanation. It develops that the "ghost" is Ann's father and that he was the victim of a foul plot perpetrated by Truby, who desired to secure control of the Miller estate. So cleverly did the scoundrel play his hand that the truth was never suspected. The doctor confesses and is placed under arrest.

THE PHONEY CANNIBAL (April 27).—In an effort to dodge their board bill, Ham and Bud depart from Mrs. Mum's home via the fire escape. The two come to a street corner where the Rev. Salamander Fish is telling of the efforts being made to convert the heathen. The missionary has a cannibal with him. The speaker's story so affects his listeners that they contribute liberally when he takes up a collection. This gives Ham an idea. Dragging Bud to a costumer he compels his pal to dress up as a cannabal. Ham dons clerical attire. Leading Bud by a chain, Ham takes up a stand on one of the streets and commences to address the crowd. His lecture and the sight of the phoney cannibal causes the crowd to fill the hat which Ham presently passes around.

In the meantime, Mrs. Mum discovers her boarders have decamped. Accompanied by several officers, she goes in search of them. Ham finishes taking up the collection and is about to place the money in his pocket when Bud grabs the cash and flees. Ham gives chase. Mrs. Mum and the officers get on the trail of the two. Ham catches Bud and is compelling him to surrender the money, when he observes Mrs. Mum and her escort approaching. The adventurers flee once more. They hide behind a tree just as their landlady stumbles and falls. The officers run down a side street and disappear. Elated with their cleverness, Ham and Bud come from behind the tree and commence counting their cash. Mrs. Mum sees the two. Pulling a revolver from her shirtwaist, she compels her boarders to fork over. Cowed by the pistol, Ham gives vent to his exasperation by kicking Bud down the street.

THE TATTOOED HAND (14th Episode of the "Girl Detective Series"—April 28).—While conversing with Jean, Patrolman Kerrigan sees Bat Dorgan insult a girl. The officer interferes and learns that the girl is his own daughter. In his anger, he manhandles the gangster and places him under arrest. Dorgan's henchmen, however, heave bricks at the patrolman from the housetops and fell him. The prisoner escapes. When Kerrigan is about to enter his home that night, he is throttled into insensibility. Jean is assigned to run the assailant down. Kerrigan informs the Girl Detective that the culprit had an anchor tattooed on his right hand. Suspecting Dorgan, Jean has Talcott, her new assistant, disguise as an English fop.

Talcott visits the dive patronized by the Dorgan gang. The money he flashes causes several of the gangsters to invite him to play poker in their den. Talcott consents and deliberately loses. Dorgan is one of the players. Later, Jean boldly visits the place and is made prisoner. Talcott and a force of officers come to the rescue. The gangsters put up a vicious battle. To Jean falls the honor of capturing Dorgan. She is non-plussed, however, to find his hand devoid of tattooing. About to make her departure, Jean's eyes fall upon a bottle of india ink and a fine brush standing on the washstand. Thus cornered, Dorgan confesses his guilt.

THE DESTROYER (Special—Three Parts—April 30).—Although engaged to Helen, Dick falls a victim to the wiles of Cherie, a dancer. Helen desperately strives to break the woman's influence. For awhile her efforts are successful. Then she and Dick visit a fashionable restaurant. There they meet Cherie. The woman monopolizes Dick and Helen goes home alone. To make sure of her hold upon Dick, Cherie flatters the boy and gives him a sum of money to invest for her. Dick loses this money in an unfortunate speculation. His father learns of Dick's intimacy with Cherie and orders him to have nothing further to do with the woman.

When Dick calls upon Cherie, he finds that his father has already spoken to her. In a bad humor, Cherie demands her money. Promising to return it the boy returns to his father's office and steals money from the safe. Later, when Wentworth learns what Dick has done, he disowns him. Dick hastens to Cherie to seek consolation. He finds Macklyn, a rival for her favor, present. When the woman hears Dick has been disinherited, she scornfully orders him to leave her apartment. With this evidence of the woman's character, Dick vows never to see her again. He eventually tries to get back into Helen's graces, but the girl's love for him has died.

Dick drifts lower down life's ladder. Months later, Cherie and Macklyn alight in front of a fashionable jeweler's. A beggar accosts them just as they leave their automobile and whines a request for money. Macklyn scornfully drops a coin into the man's hand. Cherie, however, recognizes the wretch. She contemptuously draws away from him. It is Dick.

VITAGRAPH.

BOOBLEY'S BABY (April 26).—Getting extremely tired of "strap-hanging" in the street cars, Boobley, a clerk, tells his troubles to some fellow-clerks, adding that "everyone with a baby gets a seat." They jokingly suggest he get a baby himself, so Boobley gets a large doll and carries it home that evening, wrapped up like a baby. The scheme works beautifully. He no sooner enters a car than two or three men get up and offer him their seat, but unfortunately, Evelyn, the stenographer in his office, to whom he has been very attentive, sees him. At the office she gives him a call-down and accuses him of being a married man. He explains matters to her and to prove his words says he will show her the doll. In the meantime, however, the clerks, for a joke, manage to quietly exchange the doll for a real baby. Evelyn, who had begun to feel Boobley was telling the truth, is horified on seeing the youngster and furiously denounces him. Before Boobley can get to the cloak-room where the baby is, the clerks manage to substitute the doll for the baby, so he is greatly puzzled, but guesses at the truth. That does not help him with Evelyn, however, for she refuses absolutely to have anything to do with him. He later gets on the same car with her, but is so filled with despair and rage he does not notice the girl. Opposite a lake Boobley gets off and makes straight for it. Evelyn's curiosity is aroused and she also gets off. She follows him and sees Boobley—as she thinks—throw a baby into the water. Evelyn screams, and grabbing Boobley, hangs onto him for dear life. Policemen and a crowd arrive on the scene very quickly. She hands the bewildered man over to the officers, accusing him of drowning the child. One of the policemen, after much trouble, rescues the doll amid much laughter. The sequel to these events is shown, when a year later Boobley is seen smilingly holding a fine pair of twins on his lap, while Evelyn, his wife, busies herself about the house.

THE LADY OF THE LIGHTHOUSE (Broadway Star Feature—Three Parts—Special—April 27).—Little Victor Vaughn, a blind boy, attracts the attention of Miss Hope, the "Lady of the Lighthouse," as she is called from her position as teacher of "The Lighthouse," a school for the blind, and she secures Mr. Vaughn's, a widower's, consent to educate the boy in the many things which the blind are able to accomplish. Having been kept in seclusion by his father, who did not wish the boy's affliction to become known, Victor is sullen, but under his new tutelage and new interests the boy is transformed into a remarkably clever and attractive little fellow. Victor's father visits the Lighthouse many times, and is more and more impressed each visit with the wonderful aptness and ability displayed by the pupils. Gradually, Mr. Vaughn falls in love with the Lady of the Lighthouse. On a tour through the more wretched parts of the city in search of the many blind who are difficult to reach, Miss Hope, Vaughn and his son meet Gilroy, victim of an accident in the chemical works. They bring him to the Lighthouse Clinic and learn that his case is hopeless. In Mr. Vaughn's heart there is aroused a hope by Doctor Chear's words that his boy may some day be made to see. At a little festival given by the blind children Victor astonishes all by his beautiful voice, which Miss Hope delightedly promises Mr. Vaughn to have cultivated. At Christmas time Victor is operated on and, during his convalescence, Vaughn declares his love for Miss Hope. She accepts his proposal, and when the bandages are removed from Victor's eyes it is found that he can see. Awed by the seeming miracle, Vaughn whispers to his son of the new mother he will soon have, and while both send up a prayer of thankfulness to God, the Lady of the Lighthouse tells her little charges of the glad news that one of their number will no longer have to walk in darkness, and each little heart fills with joy as they sing the Christmas anthems.

THE BOARDING HOUSE FEUD (April 28).—Aching for an opportunity to get square with strong-willed Mrs. Drexel, boarding house mistress and mother of his sweetheart, Constance, Billy sees his opportunity when his uncle Battledore is suddenly called out of town. He hangs out a "Boarders Wanted" sign in front of his uncle's house, then with a big roll of bills the young man—just after Mrs. Drexel has given all the servants a raking over—lures them all away from her. When her boarders troop down to breakfast and find no breakfast awaiting them, all quit on the spot with feelings beyond description, that lady watches them troop straight over to Billy's home for an indefinite sojourn under "his" roof. A couple of days later Billy gives a sort of grand jubilee and house-warming. Wine is passed freely and the party ends up quite hilariously with the result that when Uncle Battledore returns unexpectedly he is put out by Herr Frantz, a German musician, who, in his utterly irresponsibly frame of mind, believes Uncle to be the man who destroyed his beloved trombone. Mrs. Drexel witnesses the forcible ejection and explains to him the recent happenings. The old fellow plans to pay his nephew back in his own coin. He rehires all Mrs. Drexel's servants, and in the morning Billy's boarders leave in a body. After a public accounting, during which Mrs. Drexel and Uncle Battledore tell Billy their opinions of such goings-on, old Battledore declares his love for Mrs. Drexel, which is Billy's cue to take Constance in his arms and put an end to the Boarding House Feud.

STRICTLY NEUTRAL (April 29.)—All is peaceful and quiet in the Higgins home before the War. Flora, the French maid, Kate, the Irish waitress, Rudolf, the German chef, and Pietro, the Italian gardener; Max, Rudolph's assistant, Gaston, the French chauffeur, and James, the English butler, all get along in a very friendly manner. Rudolf divides his affections between Kate and Flora, while Pietro merely sits by and looks on with great amusement at the rivalry. One night, Max hears rumors of war between France and Germany. Max carries the news to the servants' quarters and starts a discussion. Then war is declared in Europe. Just before dinner, Rudolf catches Flora sampling a particularly dainty that he concocted. He gets angry and chases her from the kitchen. Out of revenge, she sneaks back and spoils the soup that he has gone to such great pains to prepare, by pouring pepper, tobacco, etc., into it. When the soup reaches the table, a single taste of the soup burns Higgin's mouth badly. Mrs. Higgins rushes out to the kitchen and sails into Rudolf for his carelessness. He protests innocence and tells her he suspects Flora of being the gilty one. Then the "Allies" are born. Flora tells Kate what she has done, both enter the kitchen and Kate tells Mrs. Higgins she saw Rudolf put the mixture in the soup. Rudolf nearly drops with amazement at the enormity of her statement. After dinner, all the servants get into a hot war discussion. Kate sides with Flora and Max against Rudolf, James and Gaston. As all arm themselves with heavy portable objects, such as bottles, potato mashers, etc., Pietro, who has been nervously looking on, edges towards the door. The battle starts and Rudolf is soon getting the worst of it. He calls to Pietro for assistance, but that gentleman gives one look at raging Kate and her fighting allies, then yells out, "I'm Neutral!" He is out the door in one bound, leaving the almost exhausted combatants, still fighting.

THE-SORT-OF-GIRL-WHO-CAME-FROM-HEAVEN (April 30).—Several young fellows talking together at their club ask Vinton if he never met a girl for whom he really cared. He admits that there was just one, and she was the-sort-of-girl-who-came-from-heaven! As he tells his story we see him as a young man striving to turn his budding literary genius into a practical money-earning power. Then how he meets this most beautiful girl at an ice cream parlor and falls in love at first sight with her Quaker-like modesty and shyness. He makes her acquaintance and finally gains sufficient courage to ask the demure little maiden if she will not allow him to escort her home. She consents and on the way cannot repress her exclamations of delight at the show-windows, particularly over a beautiful new hat in a fashionable milliner's, and Vinton gallantly offers to purchase it for her. She refuses, but is won over. Vinton finds the hat had a fancy price attached to it, but makes good his bluff. Next day he brings her flowers and learns that she is an actress. He goes to the theater to see her, and is more entranced than ever as she comes tripping out with the chorus. After the performance he takes her to a quaint little Bohemian restaurant, where she orders quite a large assortment of eatables and drinkables for such a bashful girl, and the check staggers Vinton. He is game, however, and pays without a whimper. Several days later he receives a handsome check from a publishing company as a retainer on the sale of his novel and at once buys some new furniture and a beautiful ring in anticipation of a happy event in the near future. He winds up by a supper at the Astorbilt. Just as they finish a most luxurious meal she sees a gentleman passing and gives a start of fear. She hurriedly rises and leaves Vinton with the sad words, "I'm afraid I must go. I see my husband waiting for me. Thank you so much for a lovely time!"

GREATER THAN ART (Special—Three Parts—April 26).—Lavinia, preferring art to a social career, refuses the offer of her aunt to introduce her to society, and leaves for Paris to study, enrolling at the Art Academy of which Pierre Panchanteau is the head instructor. While out in the woods sketching, Lavinia sees Cora Franklyn, an American girl, about to kill herself, and succeeds in restraining her. The two sleep together that night and a warm friendship is engendered. Lavinia pays Cora's passage to New York, giving her a letter of introduction to Roger Santell, Lavinia's father. A few days later, Lavinia gets notice that her tuition is due, and cables to her father for the money. She is shocked to receive news that her father had been killed in an accident and left no estate. At a meeting of the directors to consider keeping Lavinia at the Academy free of charge, because of her ability, Count Paul La Fleur, a director, becomes infatuated with her and persuades her to accept his help, after the directors have refused to keep her at the Academy.

In America, Cora, a model, has been posing for Guy Crosby, who has some trouble with his eyes, and is apparently dissatisfied with his work. He decides to go to Paris, and is given a letter of introduction to Lavinia by Cora. In Paris, by a singular coincidence, Guy attends the Art Academy at which Lavinia is a student, and soon they become enamored of each other. Count LaFleur, who jealously watches over Lavinia, is convinced of her "dual" life one evening when he returns from a restaurant with her and finds Guy in her apartment, where he had been directed to remain by Lavinia. Satisfied that he can dispose of Guy in a pistol duel, the Count proposes that they meet on the field of honor. As the Count is an expert marksman and Guy is less than mediocre, Lavinia fears for the latter, and in order to save him, writes a letter to the Count informing him that she will leave the city with him if he will call off the duel. The Count refuses and in the duel Guy receives a bad scalp wound. As a result of the duel, the Count immediately flees the country. While the wound received by Guy is only superficial, the optic nerve has been affected, and it is with immensurate apprehension that Lavinia notes his condition daily, finding solace and comfort in his company. At the Academy, where it is announced that the prize and commission will be awarded the students' competition, Lavinia, hears that hers will win the prize, slashes it, so that Guy's effort is the first choice.

His eyes much strengthened, Guy begins work on his masterpiece for which Lavinia poses. In a distant land, the Count finds the letter Lavinia wrote him before the duel, and sends it to Guy. Upon receiving it, Guy, convulsed with passion at Lavinia's apparent perfidy, goes blind. Her love for him, still as unquenchable as before, Lavinia visits his studio daily and finishes the painting, unknown to him. At the salon, the painting attracts universal attention, and an American millionaire calls at Guy's studio and purchases it. A short time previous, Guy had received a letter from the Count, to the effect that she had written the letter to save him (Guy). Lavinia slips her hand into his, and Guy is again able to see things in their proper light.

THE IDLE RICH (April 27).—Waddy Robbim and Artie Helpim, traveling men, have just been kicked off a freight car by a brakeman. They walk into the town of Hicksburg and happen along just as a young bank messenger drops a bank note from a satchel. After an elaborate reception ceremony the bill is received into Artie's waistcoat pocket. The bill is marked $1,000 and the transients are exultant. While walking through a lane, the couple meet a bad boy smoking a cigarette. After admonishing the lad, Artie confiscates the cigarette and a policeman starts in pursuit of the hoboes. The bad boy takes the opportunity to toss a brick at the pair and the blue-coated minion is the target for it. The policeman comes up with them, draws a couple of photographs of notorious criminals from his pocket and compares the men with them. He decides that a better likeness could not be found. The pair manage to get away, however, and land in a restaurant. They order up everything in sight, and when the manager asks for payment of the food, they offer him the $1,000 bill. He says it is bogus and a general fight ensues. The policeman, still suspicious of the characters, has set up a dictaphone in the restaurant in order to overhear something that would incriminate the "traveling men." As the fight in the restaurant is at its height, the policeman enters and tries to arrest the marauders. He gets the worst of the battle, and the tramps leave as the policeman is beating up the manager.

The "newly rich" try to pass off the bill on Tony, a fruit dealer. Soon all, including the policeman, are sliding all over the sidewalk on banana skins thrown promiscously about. The chase continues, A. Conan Burns, a defective detective, being added to the pursuing force. The policeman finally arrests the tramps, and to prevent the officer from disgracing their family by reporting their arrest, they give him the $1,000 bill. The policeman pockets it and soon after, the trio meet Detective Burns. The policeman hands over the bill, and accepts the reward of $100 offered for the return of it. The tramps look on in amazement as the reward is passed over. The policeman once more compares the tramps with the photographs of the criminals, and then lets them go.

COUNT MACARONI (April 28).—The Marquis of Dowryseeker is a lion among women. George and Augustus are not even in the van of the phalanx of Mary's and Madge's eligibles while the Marquis is around, so they decide to manufacture a Count. Into the street they go in search of material. Their gaze is met by Pedro Ponzillo, a "whitewing." The boys corral Pedro, and arrange with him to attend a dinner to be given by Mary the following Thursday evening. Thursday arrives, but no Pedro. Into the street the boys rush once more and collar the forgetful street cleaner. A lesson in etiquette is a matter of only a few minutes. Pedro is to be known as Count Macaroni, Mary having been apprised several days previous of his intention to be present at the dinner. The guests are all keyed up when the boys enter with the Count. He is immediately lionized by the charming girls, and the Marquis is in the shade.

It is too much for poor Mr. Marquis. At the table, as the guests are disposing of miles and miles of spaghetti, prepared for the occasion in honor of the Count, the Marquis declares war upon the Count. The Marquis presents his card, which Pedro regards disdainfully. The boys repair to the lawn with the "nobility" and the battle is on. After a few contortions during which mutual fear is registered, the Count and the Marquis embrace and go back into the house. The boys decide it is high time to dispose of the intruders, and rush off to Pedro's house where Signora Ponzillo is waiting anxiously for her husband's return. They tell her Pedro is making love to a bevy of pretty girls. The irate wife is soon inside Mary's home, shooting up the place. Down the street rushes the Marquis, never to return, while Pedro beats a retreat for dear old home. The boys return to the house triumphantly, and the girls decide that patronizing home industry is the better, after all.

POISONED BY JEALOUSY (Special—Two Parts—April 30).—It is in a city in Italy where real music can be found a-plenty. Stephano and Enrico, purveyors of statuettes, are alone. The delicate, entrancing strains of music are wafted to their ears. They are charmed. Enrico picks up his guitar, and accompanies the voice. A toast is drunk to the unseen possessor of the voice, and together they marvel at its clarity. Stephano, by employing a code of raps on the wall, gets into communication with Dolce, the owner of the wonderful voice. Enrico, who had left with a supply of casts, returns immediately and finds Stephano in the act of attracting Dolce's attention. He laughingly suggests a friendly contest for her hand. Stephano is angry at the intrusion. As the men are passing Dolce's dwelling, there is a cry of "fire" heard above the fainter cry of Dolce, imploring someone to save her canary. Into the burning house rushes Enrico, returning presently with the bird, unsinged. In the hospital, where Enrico is taken as a result of the burns received, Dolce meets his proposal of marriage with an affirmative answer.

Stephano is persuaded to remain in Enrico's house, only after he has shown his reluctance to do so. His jealousy prompts Stephano to write a letter to Enrico, purporting to be from his uncle in America, asking him to go to America at once. Enrico kisses his wife goodbye and leaves Stephano to care for her. In America, Enrico gets a job and subsequently is discovered as a singer of no mean ability. Success follows success, and soon he is hailed as a great artist. His first letter and remittance to Dolce are forwarded to her, but Stephano, realizing that his chance of winning her will be lessened by the reception of affectionate letters from Enrico, withholds subsequent letters from her. He refuses to support Dolce properly, and she and her child soon become impoverished. Stephano writes to Enrico of Dolce's death, and also misinforms Dolce of Enrico's demise. Both Dolce and Enrico are heartbroken at the news. Still Dolce has a peculiar loathing for Stephano, who continues to maltreat her. In order to get money, Dolce becomes a singer at a cabaret, but grief has destroyed her voice. It is while Dolce's daughter is singing there, that Enrico, celebrating his great success by touring Europe, hears a familiar song. He asks the child her name and the child points to Dolce, who is begging in another section of the restaurant. After husband and wife have been reunited, Enrico seeks out Stephano, who is seated in the same restaurant, and after a stilletto battle, slays the betrayer of his trust and friendship.

ON THE DAWN ROAD (April 26).—Bob Allen, star reporter on the Blade, gets a "hunch" that there is something big breaking in a fight for control of the C. I. & W. R. R. He knows that Granger, an unscrupulous financier, is fighting to get control of the stock. He goes out on the story. He is captured and thrown in a deserted shack by two crooks hired by Granger to steal the proxies held by John Armstrong, the heaviest stockholder in the railroad. In the shack he finds Helen Armstrong bound and gagged. While they are there, Granger comes out to the shack and takes the proxies which Burns has forged from the originals he has stolen from Armstrong's safe. Burns destroys the original proxies. Bob overcomes the two crooks in a fight, rescues Helen and drives to town in time for the directors' meeting, where he denounces Granger and saves the day for Armstrong. Helen falls in love with him.

BLINDFOLDED (Special—Two Parts—April 27).—Arnold Blaine, a clever rogue, is captured in possession of the Crystal Butterfly, a rare piece of jewelry which he has stolen from Andrew Meridith. His capture is the result of the efforts of Milburn Warren, an amateur detective, who is in love with Bernice Meridith, daughter of Andrew. That the jewel may not be stolen again, Warren sets a trap in which a flashlight photograph will be taken of anyone rifling the secret compartment. The jewel again is stolen and the photograph shows a picture of Blaine. But Blaine is in jail. Warren is captured and dragged to a deserted house by the crooks and is rescued by police. The crooks are captured and it transpires that the thief is the twin brother of Blaine's. Warren and Bernice announce their engagement.

THE FABLE OF A NIGHT GIVEN OVER TO REVELRY (April 28).—Having declared himself in on a jolly college dinner. Mr. Dubley, member of the class of '88, counted on having a Hot Old Time. Now at a College Dinner the main idea is to get a flying start. It was to be a Dry dinner, so most of the sons of Bohunkus were doing what a Camel does just before crossing a Desert. At 8.15 the Crowd was herded into the banquet hall. Dr. Dubley found himself marooned between two pious elders. The Oysters had been warming up since 6.30. Fortunately, the soup was not warm enough to scald the thumb of a willing longshoreman who had been brought in as an extra waiter. The Cold Storage Fish was surrounded by Library Paste and accompanied by two cute little golf balls. The rest of the menu was in order, including a petrified Quail, escorted by some Head Lettuce that carried the guarantee of a standard rubber firm. At 11.30 the First Speaker still held the floor and the Cocktail Brigade was dying on the vine. Then the oldest living graduate told the history of Bohunkus. He was past 90 and looked feeble, but at 2.30 he was still holding forth. They carried Mr. Dubley out on a shovel.

THE UNDERTAKER'S UNCLE (April 29).—The undertaker and Slim are rivals for the favor of the damsel, with Slim a shade to the good. The undertaker, in order to recover ground, pulls a poor hobo into the picture as his wealthy uncle. They visit the damsel and her mother and the "uncle" impresses the women with his wealth. A short time after, the undertaker arranges with the hobo to play dead and he invites the women to see the corpse. But Slim meanwhile gets wind of the plot, and he steals into the undertaker's rooms and conceals himself under the coffin containing the hobo. When the women appear to look their last on "Uncle," Slim drills a hole through the coffin and sticks the hobo. Of course the hobo gives everything away and the undertaker is disgraced.

THE TIE THAT BINDS (April 30).—The husband sits by the fire musing over his married life and what might have been. He gets up and goes to the window to look out into the night. Across the yard in his neighbor's house, he sees two children being put to bed by their parents. The wife neglects her married life for social affairs. The husband sees her bidding an affectionate good night to a man who is in love with her. When she comes in he suggests that they be divorced, saying that their union has been without issue. He shows her the happy family. A poor woman leaves her baby on the doorstep of the home. The husband finds the baby. The wife feels the mother love awakening in her breast. They adopt the child and are happy.

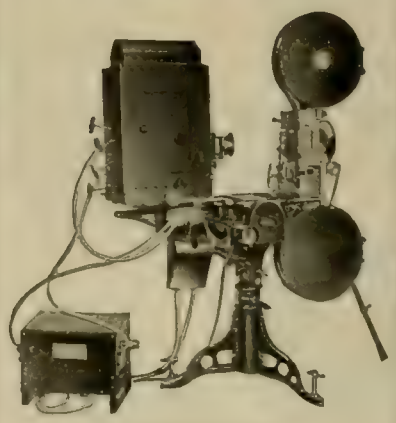
NOW USES FOUR STANDARDS



The Master Model

Mr. W. B. Fulmer, Brooklyn, N. Y., wrote under date of June 19th, 1914, as follows:

"I have been using two American Standard machines with motor drive in my theatre for over four years. I am perfectly satisfied with them. For perfect projection combined with wear at the small yearly cost for maintenance, they have no equal. My operator, who has had experience with many machines, says the STANDARD is the peer of them all. I am so well satisfied that I am ready to install them in my new theatre (The Elite) in place of two machines now installed there on trial."

Shortly after writing us Mr. Fulmer purchased two American Standard MASTER MODEL machines.

FRAUDS (Special—Three Parts—May 1).—Zelda Dunbar, a detective, on the trail of two notorious blackmailers, offers herself as their accomplice and is accepted by Eldridge and Mortimer. Zelda wins the heart of Kendrick, a rich bachelor. Zelda slips Kendrick a note saying her father is going to force her to marry a man she does not love. Kendrick takes the girl into another state. At a hotel the pair are confronted by the two blackmailers and Eldridge charges Kendrick with violating the Mann act. Kendrick is arrested. A mob threatens to lynch him. Mortimer urges Kendrick to settle for $20,000. On a signal from Zelda he does so. The crooks attempt to escape, but are prevented. The mob bursts into the room. Zelda shows her star, explaining she has been seeking evidence against the men. Zelda confesses her love for Kendrick.

THE TRAMP (Chaplin Subject—Two Parts—April 12).—Charles Chaplin, a tramp, sits at the roadside to eat his noonday repast. While the fastidious Charlie is polishing his nails another hobo steals his lunch, leaving a brick in its place. Chaplin makes his meal on grass, uses his tomato can for a finger bowl, absent-mindedly wraps up the brick in his kerchief and walks on. He comes on the hobo trying to rob a farmer's daughter and promptly taps him with the brick. The hobo's two companions rush to the scene but the brick proves effective and they take refuge in the river.

Chaplin follows but they throw mud at him and he falls into the camp fire, setting the seat of his trousers ablaze. The hoboes keep him from the river and with trousers blazing he rushes wildly in search of water, which he finds after doing considerable damage to his seating capacity. The girl takes him home, where he eats his dinner from the mantelpiece. The farmer gives him a job, but he merely messes things up, stabbing a farm hand with a pitchfork, knocking down the farmer with a sack of grain and spilling bad eggs on a spring poet.

That night he saves the farmer's home from being robbed by the hoboes, but is shot and wounded by the farmer. He finds being nursed by the farmer's daughter an agreeable occupation and falls in love. When he finds she has another sweetheart, he picks up his kerchief and brick and becomes a tramp once more.

TWO WOMEN AND ONE HAT (April 2).—The Mesdames Brown and Jones are neighbors and the best of friends. However, on a shopping expedition they both select the same hat. It is a high priced hat and neither lady has sufficient money to buy it. Mrs. Jones sells some old clothing, secures the price, and heads for the millinery shop. She has just paid for the hat when Mrs. Brown comes rushing in to buy it. Mrs. Brown won't have another hat, and the ladies quarrel.

Mrs. Brown, in passing the Jones' home, notices Mrs. Jones' hat on a table near the window. She studies the trimmings and later makes a cheap duplicate. Both ladies wear their hats to a garden party, and their millinery becomes ruined in a series of mix-ups.

A newspaper article read by the husbands of the two ladies make the men regret that they did not let their wives have new headgear, and when each man's spouse comes home with a tale of woe, the husbands buy them each a swell hat. The ladies are so happy that they kiss and are friends again.

A NIGHT IN THE JUNGLE (April 3).—John Gray, a naturalist, and his pretty daughter, Bessie, live near the jungle where Gray pursues his studies in natural history. George Graham and his son Ralph are hunters of big game and they are encamped near the Gray home. Gray leaves for the heart of the jungle to inspect some monkey traps. He falls from a tree and is badly injured.

Bessie, left alone, is attacked by Jan, a servant, whose attentions are interrupted by Graham and his son. Alarmed by Gray's absence, Ralph goes in search of him. Gray has been taken by the natives to a lonely African village where he is later found by Ralph.

Graham has remained behind to guard Bessie against Jan. Jan assaults Graham, and in the terrific struggle that ensues, Graham is almost overcome by the servant when Bessie releases a ferocious leopard, which leaps into the room during the struggle and fastens its claws and teeth into the body of Jan. When Ralph returns with Bessie's father, Jan's misdeeds are related and he is discharged. Then the acquaintanceship of Ralph and Bessie ripens into love.

HIS JUNGLE SWEETHEART (April 10).—Sylvia, living with her father, a botanist in the African jungle, has a love for and develops a strange power over wild animals. When Phillip Harding, an American hunter, and his son George are about to shoot a wild animal, Sylvia prevents it. George, having fallen in love with Sylvia, promises her that he will not shoot her jungle pets.

Sylvia's father is taken suddenly ill and dies, leaving her penniless and friendless, but for her faithful servant Boto, and the beasts of the jungle. Several years pass and the theatrical sensation of the hour is a beautiful trainer of leopards, who is none other than Sylvia. She is annoyed by an admirer from whom she protects herself by releasing one of her pet pumas lying behind a curtain.

Boto, her servant, becomes ill and en route home is taken into the automobile of George Harding, who has lost all trace of Sylvia. Boto is later the medium of bringing Harding and beautiful Sylvia together again, and then love plays its part.

THE GREAT EXPERIMENT (Special—Two Parts—April 19).—John Morning, rich, without family, dreams of things that might have been. He discovers a poverty-stricken woman who is fatally injured, takes her to her home in the slum district, where she dies, and John Morning assumes charge of the woman's daughter of fourteen, Ritta. He determines to try his "great experiment," and Ritta is unaware of whom her benefactor is.

He gives the girl wealth, and then for five years buries himself with a scientific expedition in India. At the end of that time his lawyer informs him that Ritta has been sent abroad with his spinster sister. In Bombay, John Morning again encounters Ritta and her chaperon, and is introduced to the girl as John Morning, a friend of the family.

He learn to love Ritta, which fact fills him with grief, for at forty-five he knows he is old enough to be her father. Besides, he has received a letter from a young man telling him that he wants to marry Ritta.

John and Ritta become goods friends on board ship. She confides to John of how years ago a stranger had taken her from poverty and despair and given her all she possessed today. "I would repay him with my life if I could learn who he is," she says. John decides that he cannot honorably disclose himself, nor can he honorably tell her of his love. He makes up his mind to leave the ship. He writes a note to Ritta's chaperon of his determination. Ritta finds the note, conceals herself and overhears their conversation. She immediately devises a scheme whereby she will make John Morning believe that she loves him, without letting him know that she has discovered his identity.

Ritta writes a letter to the man back home that it is impossible for her to marry him, that she does not love him, but that she loves a man who does not seem to care for her. She causes John to find this note, and his despair gives way to joy. She shows her benefactor that her love for him is real—that she has found her ideal and after all, even though he is forty-five, she loves him.

THE CONVERSION OF SMILING TOM (April 20).—Hiram Flint is about to foreclose a mortgage on widow Wilson's ranch. Maude, the widow's daughter, pleads with Flint for further time. He says he might consider it and tries to make love to the girl, who spurns him. This enrages the lawyer, who says that if the mortgage is not paid by four o'clock that day, he will take the place.

The Sheriff has received word to arrest "Smiling" Tom, who is wanted by the sheriff of another county. "Smiling" Tom and his partner are near the Wilson home and both are hungry. The widow Wilson receives them kindly, and gives them food. She later tells "Smiling" Tom of the lawyer's threat, whereupon Tom gives Mrs. Wilson the money to pay Flint, and then he and his partner depart.

When Flint calls, the widow gives him five one hundred dollar bills, and Flint leaves. "Smiling" Tom has decided to waylay Flint, and he and his partner rope the lawyer, drag him off his horse and take his money. A posse is formed, and Tom and his partner are cornered. Maude hears the shooting, and persuades the sheriff to let her speak to Tom. She induces "Smiling" Tom to surrender and promise to be a better man.

THE FACE AT THE WINDOW (April 21).—George Austin, an ill tempered man, is almost blind and employs Hester Graham as his secretary. Jack Dutton, Austin's nephew, has a talent for painting, but the old man has no sympathy with Jack's talent. Austin is furious to hear that Jack's painting is to be exhibited at the Academy. A quarrel ensues.

Later, Austin is terrified to see a man enter the room. Jack dreams that night that the quarrel with his uncle is again renewed. He is still asleep and under the spell of his dream, he gropes his way to the library and when the butler enters finds Jack bending over the body of Austin. A detective arrives, but he is satisfied that Jack is innocent of the crime, for he sees the bloody print of a man's hand on the table. A coat check leads the police to John Duncan's trail. He leaps from a window, falls to the ground and is mortally wounded. Later he confesses that Austin had

THE IDOL OF FATE (April 23).—Elaine Keith is a millionaire's daughter, and Billie Gibson is a young society man. Fate is kind and Billie is accepted by the girl he loves. However, the threads of Fate become tangled, and Billie is a victim of many evil omens.

The real trouble begins when Billie aids a mysterious young girl to catch a train. He gets into the power of the police; then continues to suffer a series of mishaps, not the least of which is the chilly treatment accorded him by Elaine, his intended. Billie at last decides to end it all by flopping into the lake, but is disgusted to find the water only up to his waist, and comes up with a diamond necklace. He finds gold nuggets in a pile of dirt, makes a balloon ascension, comes back to earth and encounters the mysterious girl, who finally explains to Elaine how Billie got arrested on her account. After that, the thread of Fate runs smoothly on.

LONELY LOVERS (Special—Two Parts—April 26).—Violet Wynne is the most observed of all, and the object of much amusement to Miss St. Clair and Miss De Mar, because she as had only slight experience behind the footlights. A silent believer in Violet, is old Van Cleet, the comedy man, and Jerry Phillips, who attracted by her beauty, develops an admiration which seemingly Violet does not see.

One morning the feminine element of the breakfast table is driven to a flurry by the entrance of Tom Pelton with the morning paper in which is announced the fact that Garrick Wheelock, the great tragedian, has suddenly lost his leading lady through illness. Miss St. Clair and Miss De Mar rush for the engagement, and Van Cleet suggests to Violet that she also apply.

The Misses St. Clair and De Mar, at the theatrical agency, observe Violet's entrance with amusement. Violet is sent to Wheelock, who declines to engage her. As Violet turns to leave, she gives way to a burst of emotion and tears which transfixes the actor. Violet rushes out; but a strange light of discovery beams in the tragedian's eyes. Violet staggers, discouraged, to her own room, only to run into Jerry. His heart softened by her tears, Jerry grasps her in his arms and then and there tells her there will still be a way. An hour or so later Violet is summoned by Wheelock, the great tragedian.

Mrs. Sullivan's boarders gather that evening as usual to find that their landlady, Violet and Jerry are missing. Then Mrs. Sullivan comes in with the news that Violet has become Wheelock's leading lady and Jerry has signed up for a stock engagement. She tells of a little wedding at the church with the great actor and herself as witnesses when Jerry and Violet were made one. Miss St. Clair and Miss De Mar are in despair and the uncommunicative Van Cleet roars with laughter at the expense of all who decried Violet.

THE HONOR OF THE CAMP (April 27).—Edgar Sill, an expert miner, taking advantage of a technicality, plans to take possession of Dunham's claim. He compels Dunham to sign a note for $1,000, payable to Sill. Merry Waymire, the daughter of an Eastern capitalist, is convalescing in California. She is saved from an acident by Dunham. Sill pays court to Merry, but is spurned. Mr. Waymire, Merry's father, arrives on the scene, intending to purchase mining property. He tells Sill that if his title is clear, he will purchase his claim.

Sill demands his thousand dollars from Dunham, who is unable to pay it. He goes to the recorder's office, but is told by the recorder that he might bluff Dunham, but he could not sell Dunham's claim without a clear title. Waymire learns the truth about the Dunham claim. The news spreads among the miners that Sill has tried a bunco game. They are infuriated and order him from the camp. Roger Dunham soon learns that Sill has no claim upon the Dunham property. The sale is then completed, and Dunham's troubles come to an end.

THE VOICE OF EVA (April 28).—Outside her humble cottage Eva listens to the voices of birds. She joins in the songs and a stranger, who enters, listens entranced. Eva's life is not a happy one and the stranger persuades her to leave her home.

Eva is tempted into a cafe by the music, and unconsciously starts to sing. The proprietor is attracted by her beautiful voice and offers her a position, which she accepts. Whitney, a widower, meets Eva, and knowing nothing of her past or present life, asks her to marry him. He tells her that he has no use for cafe life or cabaret singers.

Eva, who had resigned her position as a singer, reconsiders the matter and resumes her work. While singing one night, Whitney enters the cafe, and shortly after breaks their engagement. Eva's voice fails her. She is seized with an illness, and upon her recovery the doctor tells her she must never sing again. Whitney's little girl becomes very ill and while delirious calls for Eva. She goes to the child's bedside; there is a reconciliation between Whitney and Eva and happiness comes to them both.

AT THE MASK BALL (April 30).—Mr. Prettyman plans to go to a gay French masquerade ball without the knowledge of his wife, so he writes her that business will detain him so late at the office that he will not be home that night. Mrs. Prettyman's disappointment is great, for she has two tickets for the same ball. Her maid finally persuades her to go alone to the ball.

At the ball Mr. Prettyman becomes infatuated with a graceful columbine and Mrs. Prettyman with an audacious devil, neither reckoning on the identity of the other. A flirtation is interrupted by two policemen, who arrest Prettyman, thinking that he is Slippery Sam, a sneak thief. Prettyman escapes, and as he flees in his devil's costume, he spreads terror. Prettyman finally arrives home and the maid slams the door in his face. Then Mrs. Prettyman arrives, and after their surprise, each accuses the other of duplicity. With his inventive genius, however, Prettyman succeeds in straightening matters out.

ROAD O' STRIFE NO. 4—THE RING OF DEATH (April 26).—Immediately after his arrival in the village, Gilbert Jerome makes the acquaintance of Dr. Duncan and of Alene, and falling passionately in love with the girl, determines to marry her, thus saving the fortune and at the same time coming into possession of what he regards as a rare and unique specimen of feminine attractiveness. It does not occur to his predatory mind to attempt a courtship—he intends to force her into a marriage by whatever means may be available. He decides to eliminate Abner Gray, his only rival. It is Alene herself who affords the means. Asked by Gilbert why she likes Abner so well, the girl tells him quite simply that it is because Abner killed old Gershom. This she knows because of the ring which Abner wears.

Gilbert of course knows, through his father's confession, that Abner is innocent, but seizes this chance to dispose of him once for all. He informs the authorities of Alene's statement, and Abner is arrested, charged with murder. Dr. Duncan and his wife, through an act of kindness, have exposed themselves to smallpox, and have been quarantined along with the person stricken with the disease. Alene instinctively seeks Robert Dane for protection and advice, only to be informed that he has gone away without stating his destination.

As a matter of fact, Dane has gone to the nearby city in response to a message that the failure of a trust company has wiped out his small fortune and that his presence is necessary if anything at all is to be saved from the wreck. Alene is thus left entirely friendless, all the other villagers regarding her with suspicion and disapproval, and Gilbert thinks she must fall an easy victim to his desires although his plans have been somewhat interfered with by the arrival in the village of Clara, a woman who is madly in love with him, and who presents herself as his wife. At Gilbert's order, she leaves the village proper, but secretly finds lodging at a farmhouse nearby. Alene begins to comprehend the peril in which Abner stands. In horror she tells herself that they will hang him, because she told of the ring and that it will be she who will send him to his death.

PERCIVAL'S AWAKENING (April 27).—During the holiday vacation Percival, a bookworm, accompanies his father and mother on a trip South to spend a few weeks with old friends of the family who have an estate in Florida. On their arrival they receive a hearty welcome by Mr. and Mrs. Clayton and their daughter Elsie, who volunteers to show Percival around the grounds.

During the stroll Percival seems to be more interested in his book than in his charming companion. Percival never had any time for girls until Alice, a niece of the Claytons, arrived. Alice was an up-to-date girl, and was also a lover of outdoor sports, and soon gained the soubriquet of a "tom-boy." One morning she desired amusement and, picking an orange from the tree, threw it in the window where Percival was reading, hitting him on the forehead. It had the desired effect, and he gave chase through the grove with the intention of giving the "tom-boy" a severe lecture for her rudeness. Alice gently apologized for her act and bathed the wound with her handkerchief. Looking into her eyes, he quite forgot to give the lecture he had intended to give. From this moment on Percival could always be found in the company of Alice, very much to the dissatisfaction of his mother, who insists that he leave the "tom-boy" alone and

HER FATHER'S PICTURE (Special—Two Parts—April 28).—Grace, the minister's daughter, is a cold-blooded, scheming girl who has determined to marry for money and make a social success. Of two suitors she selects and marries John Frost, the older, because he has the most money, but later, when she learns that Frost's reported wealth was greatly exaggerated, she divorces him and marries Harry Fraser, the other suitor, who has meantime become wealthy. She and Fraser go to a big city to live. Her infant daughter, Mildred, she leaves in Frost's care, fearing that a child might prove a social drag. Later, when she learns that Frost has died and their daughter has been placed in an asylum, she decides that she will allow the child to remain there. Little Mildred longs for a mother, and learning that she has one somewhere in the world, runs away from the asylum to try to find her. Instead of finding her mother, she falls in with an "Uncle Tom's Cabin" troupe which has lost its "Eva," and is adopted into the company.

Many years pass. Fraser joins the idle rich. His wife achieves social success, but they are far from happy. Fraser meets and becomes infatuated with a musical comedy star named Winnie Willis and offers to divorce his wife if she will marry him. She gives him a little encouragement, whereupon he tells his wife he has decided to get a divorce. She cares nothing for him, but she does care for what his money stands for, and the announcement fills her with panic. Then she learns of his relations with the actress and beside herself with apprehension and anger, calls on the actress at the theater and demands that she cease trying to ensnare her husband. The actress laughs at her and orders her out of the dressing room.

After brooding over the affair for two days Mrs. Fraser becomes mentally irresponsible and decides to kill the actress. Armed with a revolver she visits her apartments for that purpose. The actress has not returned from the theater and while she is waiting for her she finds in her apartments a photograph of her first husband. This leads to her discovery that the woman who is taking her husband away from her is her own daughter. Without telling her she rushes wildly home and locks herself in her boudoir. Winnie has meanwhile sent for the husband to tell him that she will marry him. When he arrives a little later she relates to him the details of his wife's visit and refers to her strange perturbation at the sight of the photograph. One glance at the picture is sufficient to enlighten Fraser, who explains the situation. Together he and Winnie hurry to Mrs. Fraser's boudoir, but they arrive too late to save her from a tragic ending.

A ROMANCE OF THE NAVY (Special—Three Parts—April 29).—Phyllis Gardner incurs the suspicion and jealousy of her husband because of her platonic friendship for an old countryman, Emanuel. They had been childhood friends, and Phyllis extended to him her friendship because of his, and sometimes her, loneliness. In a quarrel over Emanuel, Gardner forbids her ever entering his house again and later secures a separation and the custody of the baby boy, Jack. Gardner's widowed sister dying, he adopts her son, Reggie, and suspicious of the parentage of his own child and with the idea of revenging himself on Phyllis, lets the world understand that Reggie is his son. The children are brought up in ignorance of their true relation and years afterward we find Jack believing himself to be the adopted son and Reggie the real son. Both boys want to go to Annapolis. Gardner gets Reggie the appointment.

Jack, deeply hurt and realizing that Rose, a girl they both love, now shows a preference for the luckier one, vows to get into the navy and work his way up to be the equal of Reggie. Reggie goes through Annapolis and Jack works his way up from a common sailor to warrant officer and later to ensign. Rose marries Reggie. Reggie begins to show his real nature and earns the dislike of his friends and brother officers by his drinking and gambling. Phyllis, meanwhile, has nursed thoughts of vengeance through the years and finally manages to ruin her husband. She goes to him and tells him that his ruin can be laid at her door, and he in retaliation introduces Reggie, the drinking scapegrace, to her as her son. Phyllis accepts him with bitterness in her heart. Reggie learns that his father is ruined and cannot assist him to pay his debts. Disgrace and dishonor stare him in the face. In a drunken quarrel Gardner tells Reggie he is not his son and in the struggle that follows succumbs to heart failure. Rose has overheard and awaits the opportune moment to compel Reggie to make amends to Jack.

Returning to his ship that night Reggie has a quarrel with Jack and strikes him. This and his past actions bring upon him the wrath of his superiors and he is dismissed from the service. Emanuel, Herzog and other foreigners are plotting to assist their government, which is on the verge of a war with the United States. They seize upon Reggie and ultimately gain his consent to co-operate with them. Jack is to carry important government papers and by working upon Phyllis' sympathy for her supposed son he manages to get her to help him steal the papers from Jack. She does so, thinking she is helping her son out of his disgrace. After Reggie has set several mines in the harbor he gets away in a motorboat with the papers. Rose, failing to find Reggie, tells Jack of his parentage and is overheard by Phyllis. Realizing that she is in reality bringing a terrible catastrophe upon the head of her real son she tells Jack the terrible predicament he is in. Jack starts after Reggie in another motor boat. Phyllis, remembering the switch and mined harbor, rushes to undo Reggie's crime. She throws all the switches in time but one. That one runs to a mine just beneath Reggie. The mine explodes and Reggie is killed. Jack gets back his papers and is reunited with his mother, happy in the thought that later Rose will consent to be his wife.

WHEN THE RANGE CALLED (April 30).—Far out west on a lonesome cow-ranch lived a reckless, care-free cowboy, Lem Hart by name. One day Hart received a letter from an attorney stating that his uncle died and left him a fortune. This did not seem to bother Lem in any way, as he cared not for worldly goods. In the letter the attorney stated that he would follow soon and escort Lem to his Los Angeles mansion. Lem did not like the idea of leaving his comrades on the ranch, but was forced to, to protect his family name.

Upon his arrival at his mansion he is introduced to Agnes Merrick, a young society girl, and her family. Agnes' mother and father conceive the idea to marry Agnes to the cowboy millionaire, a scheme which does not seem hard to do, as they soon learn to love each other. Lem gets a reception from the society folks and upon being introduced to them is fawned upon by them on account of his money, but laughed at behind his back on account of his awkwardness. Fred Mason, a young man about town, who is in love with Agnes, conceived the idea to tell Hart that she does not love him, but is only marrying him for his money. Hart, at the same time, discovers that his supposed friends are a lot of hypocrites. He decides to give a dinner and tell them what he thinks of them and then return to his range country.

While at the dinner, Mason proposes a toast to Lem's health, when Lem rises and calls them a lot of leeches and parasites, and forces them at the point of two big western guns to leave the house. During the excitement, Lem hurts his hand slightly and takes his handkerchief from his pocket, when he accidently pulls a letter out, which falls to the table right under Agnes' eyes. Agnes finds it is addressed to her and opens it, and in it Lem tells her that he is going to leave for the ranch, and that as she loves Mason he hopes she will be happy, and enclose in letter a deed to half his fortune to make her so. Agnes is indignant and in her anger tears the letter up, throws it in his face and leaves the house. Lem, seeing the situation, follows her and after strong pleading he finds out that he is the one Agnes loves and not Mason. He asks forgiveness; they are married and settle on the rich ranch in the cattle country, where Lem can enjoy the freedom of the range and the love of his society girl wife.

SAFETY FIRST (May 6).—Poor old Patsy is henpecked. Smoking is one of his forbidden delights. On the quiet he indulges in the weed, and runs up a bill with the town's lady tobacconist, who writes for her dues. Tilda, his wife, finds the envelope—feminine hand writing! Patsy divines the situation to follow and runs for his life, his better half in pursuit. A policeman catches Patsy before wife can do it. At the intercession of a friend Patsy is released and arm in arm they stroll to the nearest thirst emporium to cement their friendship.

Midnight comes. Tilda is patiently awaiting Patsy's return home to welcome him with a broom handle. Fearing just such a reception Patsy decides on any port in a storm and uses a freight car as a haven of shelter. The church deacon witnesses Patsy's unusual behavior and is deeply shocked. In the night Patsy's Pullman is coupled to a train. Upon awakening in the morning the now sobered spouse finds himself in a town one hundred miles from home. He visits a friend and his wife. There the church deacon, who is on a business trip, discovers Patsy and surmises he is leading a double life. In the meantime Tilda has the police on the trail of her missing provider. When they learn the deacon's suspicions wife starts for Patsy's new habitat. She finds him in company with his friend's wife, rocking her baby!

Then the crash comes. Patsy hastily exits followed by his tormentor. Through the streets they rush followed by the whole police department, who finally corral and jail the disturbers. In their separate cells they are left to soliloquize. Tilda weeps copiously at the unexpected outcome of her plan, while Patsy smilingly indulges in his weed—a victory gained.

BIOGRAPH.

THE EBBING TIDE (April 19).—Few in the fishing village noted that the old shipbuilder's little bare-legged lass had become, overnight, a wonderful being, beautiful and shy as a seabird. One who delighted in the transformation was the young fisherman who never looked at other girls. Another was Tarrant, the ship owner; he coveted her with all his crooked soul. He took to dropping in, of evenings, at the little cottage beside the shipyard, and the things he whispered turned the old man's head. "If she marries me——" was his theme, with a world of promises which he may have intended to keep. But the girl would have none of him, even after her father, in fury, ordered her to receive the ship owner as her betrothed. Separated from her fisher lad, she became ill. The old doctor, wise in the ways of women, declared that one thing alone could save her life. Panic-stricken, her father ran and brought the fisherman. With a cry of joy she felt her lover's arms once more about her, and in that rapture her spirit passed. When they would have come near her, the grief-stricken lover turned furiously upon them, and they slunk away, leaving him with his dead.

THE QUICKSANDS OF SOCIETY (Special—Two Parts—April 20).—John Thorpe inherited his uncle's fortune and began to worship the gods of society, which opened its doors to the new multi-millionaire. When Nina Carlton, a social parasite, crossed his path, it was a foregone conclusion that she would ruin him. But more bitter even than the loss of John's honor, to Mrs. Thorpe, was the discovery that society had fastened its clutches upon her son. Reproached, the boy wept and threw himself into his mother's arms. She thanked God for that. After the divorce John married Nina, but was not happy with her. Her position secured, she flirted openly with young Scott. Upbraided by her husband, she eloped with her lover. Their automobile was wrecked, and Nina was brought home dead. That was the day when Thorpe, utterly lonely, received a visit from his son, whom, after years of silence, he had begged his former wife to send to him. In the cleanlimbed, honest boy he saw himself as he once was, and groaned over the dead past. At his son's instance, though never hoping for forgiveness, John Thorpe, a humble and contrite man, returned to the scene of his former happiness. But women are always ready to forgive when they know that love is not dead. John Thorpe knelt at his wife's feet, and her bitterness melted. One victim of society had won free of its quicksands at last.

TO HAVE AND TO LOSE (April 22).—Lost in the brush and looking for water, the husband becomes separated from his young wife and friend. The latter, going to look for him, also loses his bearings after finding the husband's coat. Left alone, the girl wanders, frenzied, and is found by a lone prospector, who takes her to his cabin and, on learning her story, sets out to seek her husband. He meets two prospectors, who tell him that they have recently buried a dead man whom they found at the foot of a cliff. They have his coat, which the girl recognizes as her husband's. Still she cannot believe that he is dead. Unwillingly the prospector goes again to seek him, for he has learned to love the girl and wishes her husband dead. After finding him, he is sorely tempted to let the exhausted man die; but his better nature triumphs, and for her sake he saves him.

WHEN HEARTS ARE YOUNG (April 23).—While his motherless girl was growing up, Silas Ross had remained a widower, without thought of remarriage. But soon Adeline would be leaving the nest, and he would be alone. With so sweet a woman as Mrs. Prentice for his next-door neighbor, it is not to be wondered at that he lost his heart a second time. On her part, the gentle widow found him irresistible, although she wondered what Jack would say when he came home from college. "Let's keep them in the dark," suggested Silas. Adeline brought home her chum, Letty, who promptly fell in love with Jack. But he had eyes only for Adeline. So the jealous Letty, discovering their parents' plot to bring the young people together by pretending to object to their marriage, spitefully told what she knew. Jack and Adeline eloped. Letty, furious on discovering that her plot had failed, departed in high dudgeon. Old Mike, the widower's gardener, brought word of the elopement, in which he had assisted, and took advantage of the romantic atmosphere to capture the heart of the stubborn Arabella, who kept house for his mistress. The plot having succeeded. Silas pressed the widow to make him the happiest man on earth.

JEAN, THE FAITHFUL (April 24).—Odette, the lacemaker, preferred Pierre above all her suitors. Jean, hopelessly in love with her, kept his bitter secret to himself. When Odette's sight began to fail, through bending too closely above the lace, a pang shot through him at the thought of those lovely eyes dimmed forever. Pierre showed his real character when his sweetheart became totally blind. He soon found another bright-eyed maiden and ceased to visit Odette. Jean, bringing his little gifts of the wild flowers she loved, was startled one day when she called him Pierre. Her mother begged him to keep up the deception. He heard the doctor say that the great specialist might restore his darling's sight—no one else. So he took his savings and went to the famous man. After an examination the specialist gave hope that Odette might see again. The day came when she saw—and Jean dared not go near her. But she learned the truth on seeing Pierre with his sweetheart among the flowers. Then Pierre came back, and would have wooed her again; but she disdained his shallow pretenses and turned to the faithful Jean.

THE CHILDREN'S HOUSE (April 26).—"Children's Houses" like this have been established throughout the United States. The children have complete charge of them and keep them in order. Thousands of tiny tots, the men and women of to-morrow, are learning through play, like the three-year-olds in this picture, things which fit them for useful work in the world. And they enjoy doing it. This method of teaching young children the way they ought to live when grown up is known as the Dr. Montessori method and is education in its most practical form, and has attracted the serious attention, not only of educators, but of parents in all countries who wish to give their children every advantage. Dr. Montessori is a great Italian educator.

ADAM BEDE (Special—Two Parts—April 27).—Adam Bede, the carpenter, felt that life was good. His work prospered; the rich young squire, Arthur Donnithorne, was his friend and patron. Rarest of all Heaven's blessings, he had a sweetheart—Hetty Sorrel. Suddenly his dream was shattered; passing through the wood, he saw Hetty yielding her lips to Arthur. It was one of many clandestine meetings, he learned, after the fight which followed his stern rebuke of Arthur's dishonesty. "Your social station makes it impossible for you to marry her," he had said. "Tell her so and see her no more." Arthur went away; Adam took his farewell message to the girl. Heartbroken, she yielded to Adam's pleadings, and to her uncle's will that she marry the carpenter. They were betrothed, and all who knew them were glad—even Dinah Morris, who loved Adam secretly. Next day Hetty was missing, and they sought her in vain. She had followed Arthur to London. Unable to find him, she wandered, forlorn, and found shelter with a cottager. Here her baby was born. When the self-righteous woman learned that Hetty was not married, she turned her out. Worn out in body and soul, Hetty performed what she believed to be the kindest act toward her child. A yokel saw her, and she was arrested for murder. This dreadful news came to the village; it reached Arthur Donnithorne, also. Adam and Dinah did all in their power to save her, but she was condemned to die. They could only comfort her as best they might. On the awful day she was led forth into the square, where the gallows awaited her. Dinah supported the shrinking form. All was in readiness; the last rites of the church had been spoken; suddenly a rider was seen approaching on a horse lathered with foam. It was Arthur Donnithorne. He brought the King's pardon. But Hetty did not long survive. Dying, she joined the hands of Adam and Dinah, whose secret she had learned during those dreadful days.

FOOL'S GOLD (April 29).—Gone daft through years of searching for El Dorado, the old miner thinks that the vein of iron pyrites he has found is a lode of rich gold-bearing earth. With frantic joy he displays his samples at the saloon in town, and invites everybody to celebrate his luck. The knowing ones kindly congratulate him and wink at each other; a young prospector saves the situation by secretly giving the bartender money with which to cash the "nugget" tendered by the old man in payment for the drinks. A greaser among the crowd sees the transaction and believes that the old miner has really struck gold. He determines to rob him of his claim and follows when the veteran, with elaborate caution, proceeds to his mine.

The young prospector and the sheriff are rivals for the hand of the miner's orphaned niece, and bad blood arises between them. The sheriff threatens openly to "get something on" his rival. Under the influence of liquor he follows the prospector and sees him shoot the greaser, who has apparently killed the crazy miner. The sheriff takes advantage of his authrity to arrest his rival, and handcuffs him, although he protests that border law justifies his act. On the way to town the sheriff stumbles and falls to death. The prisoner contrives to take the key to the handcuffs from his pocket and, after a vain effort to release himself, is freed by the girl.

HIS POOR LITTLE GIRL (April 30).—The shabby-genteel old gentleman sends his daughter to a fashionable school, but is unable to afford her the luxuries to which the other girls are accustomed. She meets with a reception in marked contrast to that which everybody, from the principal down, gives to the daughter of a millionaire. Timid and lonely, she does not enjoy the first days at school. Then the rich girl takes her up, gives her pretty dresses and in other ways makes life pleasant for her. At the rich girl's graduation party her most eligible young man pays so much attention to the poor girl that she becomes jealous. On an automobile tour the rich girl's car breaks down near the poor girl's home, and she invites her companions in. When they make fun of her father's old-fashioned ways she flares up and bids them begone. Only the young man stays, and after her father's death it is he who consoles her with his love.

THE GRIM MESSENGER (Two Parts—April 25).—Jules, a French Canadian trapper, lives with his mother in a little cabin clearing among the great pines of the northwest. He is studying law by himself. Edna, a society beauty, is so worn out from gay life that the doctor says she must go to the Canadian woods for a complete rest. She is engaged to Arthur Vort, a wealthy young society man. Resting one day under a tree by the roadside after a long walk, a big snake is in the act of attacking her when it is shot by Jules, who is examining his traps. Edna is delighted to meet the young Canadian, who offers her a chance for an amusing flirtation to while away the hours. To her the ensuing months are keen fun. To the man, unusued to the world's way of playing with the deeper sentiments, the words and glances that pass are expressions of love. Edna meets Jules' little mother and becomes a regular visitor at their cabin. One day Edna kisses him a bit playfully. Jules is dazed, but only for a moment, and then he draws her fiercely to his arms. Edna does not protest. Jules goes back to the little cottage filled with a flame of happiness and prays to the Virgin to make him worthy of Edna. Meanwhile she received a letter from her fiance saying that they will go to Europe on their honeymoon.

Two months elapse. The time of Edna's banishment from her social life is nearing conclusion. One day Jules meets her and leads her through the woods to a little clearing. For these many weeks he has neglected his studies mysteriously. Now all is explained. In the little clearing he has built a tiny cabin. In it he has put his plain home furnishings, cheap prints, gay carpets, crude furniture and on one side a picture of the Virgin. He unlocks the door and leads Edna inside. She is puzzled. He says it is their little home. "You poor fool. I was only amusing myself," she cruelly explains. Jules drives her from the house and turns back to the little bedroom. Edna, frightened at his anger, runs back to the hotel. Before the Virgin's picture Jules stands stricken, then in a burst of fury snatches it from the wall and throws it on the floor.

The next day Edna packs her things and sends her maid with a note to Jules. He is leaving for the far north with his gun and his pack. He takes the note with him as he kisses his mother good-bye and leaves. The note contains a check and these words from Edna: "I am sure this check will cover your expense. I am generous with my money and my kisses; keep both. Which is torn worse, your heart or your pocketbook?" That night Jules shot himself.

Edna's wedding day arrives. In the present room the guests watch a wonderful collection of silver, gold, glass and china from Edna's wealthy friends. A box arrives marked, "To be opened by the bride on her wedding day. Valuable." Edna and the bridegroom enter the room and the box is opened. Her note and check fall out. A cold shiver warns her that the contents are not meant for happiness, for both are bloodstained. Out from this mass of paper wrappings she takes a grinning skull and then in the gaping socket where once gleamed an eye full of love for her she finds this note: "He belonged to you in life. He belongs to you in death. His Mother."

White-faced and staring, the bride gazes ahead of her. The lights and flowers and gleaming gifts, the faces of admiring friends fade away and in their place comes a vision of the Canadian woods. Stretched on the snow-covered ground is the body of Jules. Gaunt gray wolves prowl nearby. With a scream the bride throws the skull from her, hopelessly insane.

COURAGE (April 29).—Walter Clyde and Ruth Angove are sweethearts. Walter is a protege of Dr. Angove, Ruth's father. Walter receives his diploma and the young couple become engaged. Broderick Flynn, a Westerner, arrives in the city bent on having a good time.

In the vicinity of Ruth's home toughs attempt to hold up Flynn. Ruth and Walter are attracted to the scene; Walter goes to the assistance of Flynn and is knocked out by one of Flynn's assailants. Flynn puts up a fierce fight, finally putting the toughs to flight. One of the toughs, pausing in his flight, turns and fires at Flynn, who falls with a bullet through his shoulder. He is taken to the nearest house, Ruth's home. When Flynn is becoming convalescent, he tells the story of his western life to Ruth, who apparently falls in love with him to such an extent that she later agrees to marry him. Walter learns his fate from a letter that Ruth sends him from her home out west. The boy takes his medicine like a hero. A lapse of four years shows Ruth and her husband in a small mining town out West.

There is a sickly little boy, the issue of their marriage, on whom both parents lavish a wealth of love. Flynn's love for the cards has grown stronger, and in a gambling hall, a row is precipitated by Flynn catching a dealer cheating. In the struggle which ensues, the false beard is torn from the face of the dealer, the latter proving to be Flynn's old enemy, Red McHugh. Flynn gives this man an unmerciful beating. Flynn returns home to find the doctor at the bedside of the sick child. The doctor tells the stricken parents that transfusion alone will save the boy's life. The boy is taken to the hospital at Sacramento, to which institute Walter has been appointed as medical superintendent.

The operation is about to be performed, when Flynn at the psychological moment, winces from the lancet, and leaves the room. Ruth offers her blood, but she is declared unsuitable. Walter, arriving in the nick of time, gives his blood to the child. The operation is a success. The parents are ignorant of Walter's sacrifice. That night the mother is shown at the crib watching over the sleeping child.

Flynn is at the cabin and as he looks at the picture of his baby he drinks to drown the memory of his cowardice. McHugh on the outside of the cabin draws a gun on the unconscious man and the soul of Flynn is sent into eternity. Three months later the young widow and her perfectly healthy boy are seated by the banks of a rippling mountain stream. The girl, buried in a reverie, is unconscious of the boy's movements. He toddles out of reach and, going beyond his depth in the water, is quickly carried towards the rapids.

Walter, enjoying a solitary stroll along the hillside, is attracted to the scene and rescues the boy. He restores the boy to the arms of his distracted mother. The boy makes known to his mother that Walter and he are friends, turning back his sleeve and showing the scar of the operation. Ruth bares Walter's arm and obtains corroboration of the boy's statement. The boy, searching for candy in Walter's pocket, discovers the old family ring, which, given to her in betrothal, Ruth had returned to Walter. The boy puts the ring on his mother's finger as the picture fades.

LAEMMLE.

THE CURE OF THE MOUNTAINS (April 25).—William Conway, a slave to drink, is at last told by his wife that he will have to leave her for their own good and her own health and happiness. She urges him to fight against the craving for liquor and to try to overcome it. If he succeeds, she promises to take him back and start life over. He accepts the terms and goes to the distant mountains to fight it out alone.

In the moutnain resort lives Beth, the daughter of the hotel keeper, who has a childish love affair with Charles Vassar, a boy of the mountains. Upon the arrival of Conway, Beth appoints herself his guide. They become firm friends, but Charles grows jealous, imagining it a love affair. After several weeks, the story of his trouble is told to Beth by Conway. She sympathizes with him and in a burst of affection throws her arms about his neck. Charles, seeing this, is driven wild with anger and charges Conway with having stolen his sweetheart, at the same time attempting to shoot him.

Conway grabs the gun and pulling a telegram from his pocket, which he has received that morning from the city, shows it to the boy. The telegram reads: "Come home. Your wife and new-born son need you. Lovingly, your wife." Charles realizes his mistake and from a distant rock, Conway sees the happy reunion of the young sweethearts.

A PROPHET OF THE HILLS (Two Parts—April 28).—The Masons and the Blakes are neighbors in the mountains; Jim Blake and Nan Mason, their respective children, are sweethearts. Nan's father is building a boundary fence when Jim's father comes upon him and his men and an argument follows. Later on the difference develops into a feud and shots are exchanged between the two factions, in which Frank Mason is shot in the arm. This adds fuel to the flames and the news spreads through the mountains, the friends of each clan flocking to their leaders.

There has come into the mountains an old man, who is distressed because of the feud. He meets Jim and his sweetheart, Nan, in the woods and leaves them with a kindly word. He finds Frank Mason wounded and calling for help, gets him home with the assistance of Jim and Nan. When Mason recovers consciousness and sees a Blake in his house he is frantic with rage and orders Jim out. Jim goes home and is told his family's side of the feud. He refuses to have anything to do with the feud and goes to the house. Unable to stand the jeers and insults heaped upon him for being a coward, he takes his rifle and goes into the woods. Here he meets the "Old Prophet," who finally persuades him to throw his rifle into the creek and gives him a Bible instead.

Jim puts the book in his breast pocket and leaves. He is shot from ambush by Nan, who takes him for one of the clan, but when she recognizes him she is overcome with remorse, thinking him dead. The Bible, however, has saved his life by stopping the bullet. He is only stunned and when he comes to, Nan remembers he is her enemy and tells him next time she will get him. Jim tells her he can't make war on a woman and they part.

Nan meets the "Old Prophet" and he persuades her that she is in the wrong and takes her rifle away. Jim arrives and aided by the old man's efforts the two are reconciled. Meanwhile the two clans are preparing for a fight and the first shot reach the ears of the three. They go to see what the shooting is about. Each side is concealed, but when Nan's father sees her with Jim, he recklessly leaves his hiding place to kill Jim. The "Old Prophet" frustrates his attempt and in turn is killed by a bullet intended for Mason. Over the "Old Prohpet's" body a reconciliation is effected between the two clans.

STERLING.

PLAYMATES (April 15).—Olive and Margie are playmates. They are at the breakfast table and mother allows them to go out and play marbles, telling them first to be sure and keep clean. While playing they spy three of their friends on the other side of the street also playing marbles. "Toughguy" Jack, Harry and tiny Billy run across the street and soon they are all playing an animated game. They throw the marbles which they have won in a cigar box at one side and little Billy cautiously helps himself to as many as he can get into his chubby hands. He has a deal of fun throwing them one by one in a hole in the fence and pretty soon there isn't a marble left in the box. So that ends that game.

Then someone suggests that they "make boats." So they run along and stop by the wayside and take off their shoes and stockings. They jump into a dirty pond and come out bespattered with mud from head to toes. Of course, they are afraid to go home looking like that, so they creep into the bathroom without mother seeing them. Soon the bathroom and bath tub are black and dirty from their clothes and grimy bodies. They manage to get into their bedroom and then ensues a pillow fight. One of the pillow cases bursts and soon the room is filled with feathers. Mother, however, comes to the rescue and everything ends well.

WHERE OUR MORNING PAPER COMES FROM (on same reel as foregoing).—Scenes taken in a large paper mill, showing the process of producing pulp, and the various phases of preparing a big daily newspaper. First is shown the process of bleaching, then the screening of the stock to remove all imperfections, the working of the huge rollers and the final finished product.

POWERS.

TINY HANDS (May 1).—The story opens with a prologue on May 5, 1862, when Captain Monroe says good-bye to his wife and baby before starting for the front. His little baby clutches his fingers and the soldier retains a mental picture of this incident as a last memory of the little one.

On August 6, 1864, Captain Monroe arrives in a Southern town. He has received news of the death of his wife and baby. In the town lives Mrs. Elsie Kirby, who is known as "The Little Widow" to her neighbors. On the entrance of the Federal troops in the town, Captain Monroe takes his headquarters in Mrs. Kirby's home.

She is forced to accept the intrusion, but leaves to go to her mother's home. On the way she is held up by a sentry in the streets. Meanwhile the old "Mammy" fearfully puts Mrs. Kirby's little baby in a clothes basket to carry it out. Tremblingly, she starts on her way to carry the baby to the "Little Widow." She, too, is held up by the sentry.

Captain Monroe rides up and asks what is in the basket. "Mammy" draws away, but in thrusting his hands inside, his fingers are clutched by the hand of the little baby, which brings back memories of his own child. The story ends when the Captain sitting erect in his saddle, salutes the "Little Widow," who gathers her baby in her arms.

L-KO.

SHAVED IN MEXICO (April 28).—Senor La Bullio was a fierce, wild lover and also the village barber. He made the big hitio with Senorita Hitchey Koo, until Mr. Perkins, the globe trotter, appeared. The latter made an easy conquest of Senorita, but made the mistake of talking about it when he went in to get a shave. Senor Bullia had him conveniently in the chair with an assortment of razors within reach. Mr. Perkins cursed his glib tongue and the Senor reached for them. Perkins' regrets didn't appease La Bullio, and he tried to get out. The Senor was a better runner than he, however. Other rivals had this fact impressed on them when they got in the way of the sprinters. The Senorita turned out to be a fickle jade and shook the bunch.

UNLIKE OTHER GIRLS (Two Parts—April 29).—The Darrells and the Barnetts live in the same town. The former family is of the wealthier class, while the latter are farm people in humble circumstances. Ray Darrell and Polly Barnett were sweethearts in their youth, but as time passes both are sent away to school. Mr. Darrell is a railroad builder and desires to secure the property on which the Barnett homestead is situated. The railroad is built through the land, but the Barnetts refuse to sell their old homestead for the figure offered. On the completion of the railroad, the Barnetts open a lunch room near the temporary depot and at the start are quite successful.

Polly returns home from school and Ray from his college. The Darrells being unable to purchase the Barnett site which they desire for a new depot build in opposition a lunch room across the track and consequently the business of the Barnetts falls off. Polly takes the kitchen in hand, however, and soon brings trade back to its former standing. Ray Darrell, not knowing that Polly is the cook, suggests that the only way to best the Barnetts is to kidnap their cook. He joins the expedition and comes upon Polly. A compromise is agreed upon, the Barnetts receiving almost the figure they originally demanded, while Ray wins the cook in earnest, Polly becoming his promised wife.

MATTY'S DECISION (Two Parts—April 27).—The baseball season is over, and Christy and his pal, Eddie, are wondering where they go for a vacation. Eddie facetiously remarks that he thinks Hoboken would be a desirable seaside resort. Christy playfully thrown the ball at Eddie. Our old friend Fate enters into the game. The ball which was thrown misses Eddie craches through the window and lights on the head of a young lady, upsetting her dignity and also her temper. She calls a policeman and together they enter the house for the purpose of arresting the perpertrators of the dastardly act. However, the representative of the law finds the occupants of the apartment asleep. The dreams of the slumberers are rudely shattered, and they are promptly hauled before the young lady in question. She asks for an explanation and Christy, with all the dignity he can assume, hands the offending baseball to the policeman with the curt remark, "Arrest the ball." Upon which Eddie starts to smile.

A ROMANCE OF HAWAII (April 30).—Rosselli, a famous painter, accompanied by his daughter, Marie, and her fiance, Bainbridge, arrive in Honolulu and at once sets out in search of a model. Rosselli is attracted by the native fishermen and through them he meets Clifford, a captain of the Hawaiian fishing industry. He is a picturesque character and Marie becomes interested in him and also in his daughter Leola. Entirely without grounds, for Marie feels nothing more than a passing friendship for Clifford, Bainbridge becomes jealous of Clifford. One day he follows Marie and Leolo and sees them visit Clifford at and accomplishes nothing except to discredit himself.

Bainbridge hires an enemy of Clifford to abduct the fisherman and murder him. The hired assassins overpower Clifford and take him aboard their boat. The prisoner puts up what resistance he can. Realizing, however, that this is useless, he plays 'possum. He falls upon the deck and pretends that he is dead. The hired murderers are deceived and throw him overboard; Clifford strikes out and swims for land. The following morning Rosselli visits a plantation fronting on the ocean to secure a desired landscape effect. Marie and Bainbridge accompany him. In the meantime Clifford has struggled to shore and fallen exhausted. He is discovered by a native woman and later by Rosselli and his party. When he regains consciousness Clifford accuses Bainbridge. The would-be assassin plainly shows his guilt and is led away to answer for his crime.

JOKER.

NO SOUP (May 1).—The American Consul is stationed away off among the Igorottes, and leads a most lonely existence. He pines for the sight of an American, and especially so for one of the fair sex. The day the minister and his wife land, they try to help the poor savages to a better way of living and are spied by the ever alert consul; the minister's daughter especially being noticed. He meets them and offers the hospitality of his house. The girl is also accompanied by her small dog. The consul is entertaining his visitors, when the girl's dog breaks away. As soon as the dog is missed, there is consternation, for the "dog-eating" habits of the Igorottes are well known and the consul leads the search.

They go to the butcher's, where there is quite a collection of dogs, and make a thorough search but all in vain. He tells them that he has not seen anything of the dog. The girl is in tears, and in her excited state, tells the consul that she will marry whoever finds her dog for her. This is an added spur to him, for, with the girl's heart and millions in his hands, he need never work again. The search spreads, the consul adding to his party all that he can get his hands on, but as they are natives and a dog would be an acceptable dish to any of them, he has to watch them as well as look for the dog.

They have some merry chases after first one dog and then another, and it appears that the dog has been put in the "soup" pot, when the consul finally spies him. There is a happy reconciliation and the minister's daughter, to show that she appreciates the consul's efforts in her behalf, agrees to take him as her life partner.

NABBED (Two Parts—May 1).—One of the chief difficulties encountered by the new Chief of Police, is the Red Light Abatement Act and a bunch of so-called "reformers," who make things lively for the new chief. The chief orders the Red Light district closed. This act brings the new chief in conflict with one of the big ward bosses, who controls the Red Light district. The boss calls on the chief, expostulating at his action. Another ward boss who controls the rooming and eating houses also calls on the chief and the two make things pretty warm for the new chief. During the controversy, the chief loses his patience and knocks down the ward boss who controls the Red Light district. The head of the "reformers" is also a thorn in the chief's side and he is continually wrangling with him. He has a wife and daughter who also seemingly takes a large part in the agitation against the new chief.

The chief plans a raid on the places in order to show that he is doing his duty, and the plan gets to the ear of the ward boss, whom he has previously knocked down. He gets hold of the chief's daughter and takes her by stealth to the house that is to be raided. The raid is pulled off according to schedule, but the chief's daughter is befriended by Nan Cooper, an inmate of the house, and hidden in a waste paper can. Thus she is not taken with the crowd.

The prisoners are taken to the station house and the ward boss tells the chief that he had better not have the prisoners charged with lawbreaking, as his own daughter is with the bunch. This is a hard blow to the chief, but he tells them that he will do his duty and if his daughter is caught with the others, she will have to suffer the consequences. The prisoners are accordingly brought in and great is the ward boss's discomfiture when the girl is not found among the others. But a surprise is in store, for the daughter and wife of the chief 'reformer" are brought in, having been captured in the raid. The story closes with the chief firmly seated in his new position. The girl of the underworld who had assisted his daughter is given a new chance, and the two ward bosses and offending "reformers" get their just deserts.

TEN MINUTES WITH HOMER CROY ON INDIA (April 13).—Homer Croy enters a typical East Indian vehicle and is wheeled up a street of Bombay. The next scene is a candy shop, which is really a candy stand, as it is outside a store and consists of huge baskets filled with different kinds of sweets.

Then is seen another mode of conveyance, consisting of carts drawn by oxen. Next is shown a scene in a public square, a Hindu ferris wheel, a crude old-fashioned affair, probably a thousand years old, a merry-go-round and a street with hundreds of beggars asking alms.

Two Hindoos, with their "cobars," do uncanny tricks to the tune of a weird song, played on a pipe-shaped instrument, after which there is shown a scene at the city well, where hundreds meet daily to wash their clothes, as well as their bodies. One mother is seen putting soap in her little son's eye to wash it.

Miss Dill Pickle, who is on the last lap looking for a man. The girl and her father are also registered there, as is the girl's sweetheart. The girl and her father have made the acquaintance of the Duke and the old man has decided to have a Duke in the family and so introduces his daughter to show her best points to the Duke. Jack, her sweetheart, tries in vain to get the inside running with the girl but is foiled at every turn.

Miss Dill Pickle has also picked the Duke for her own and proves quite a hinderance to the old man's schemes, always turning up in time to spoil the well laid plans of father. Jack is in a quandary, every way he turns he meets with a checkmate. It seems that all hope of his winning the girl has been lost and he is in despair.

The Duke makes an appointment with the girl to have a little stroll in the park and Jack gets wind of it. At last he sees his chance to get even. With the assistance of some of his friends, he disguises them as the false wife and son of the Duke and springs the deception. The Duke is overcome with embarrassment and astonishment and believing in the old adage of "he who fights and runs away," etc., takes to his heels. The trap is a success and the Duke is put out of the running. The last we see of him is a blur going down the road swiftly growing smaller and smaller.

TWO HEARTS AND ONE SHIP (April 23).—Eddie returns from college and is offered a position in his father's business, a dairy. His father informs him that he must be down to the office early and Eddie willingly promises. It isn't so easy to get up in the morning, however, and he arrives at the office very late, but dressed in the latest fashion. He asks for his desk in the office, but his father informs him that he must start from the ground up and his first position will be that of driving a milk wagon. This is quite a come-down for Eddie, but he, nevertheless, complies with his father's wishes. Mrs. Gray has a charming daughter and is expecting to give a luncheon to several guests. Mary, Mrs. Gray's maid, however, is taken sick. Miss Gray volunteers to act as maid. Her mother consents, feeling it will not do to let her guests know that she has no maid to serve them. Later, Miss Gray, in the kitchen, is busy with the duties as her mother's maid. The milkman calls to deliver their daily supply of milk. Behold, it is Eddie, who sees much to admire in Miss Gray, whom he supposes to be the maid. Miss Gray is very much impressed with the milkman. An enjoyable little flirtation follows.

Next day, Miss Gray is more than willing to act as maid and convinces Mary, the real maid, that she is really too sick to reassume her duties. The milkman comes all right, and the love-making begins all over again. Mrs. Gray, however, happens in and discovers her daughter in the embrace of one whom she believes to be only a common milkman. She forthwith orders her daughter to take off the maid's dress and go to her room and tells Eddie she intends to report him to his company for his presumption.

The sky is very dark for the two young lovers. Next day Eddie calls at the Gray home. Miss Gray has bribed the maid to allow her to assume the maid's dress when the milkman calls. Eddie proposes marriage and invites Miss Gray to go with him to the minister. Mrs. Gray decides she has had enough of Eddie's monkeyshines, and goes direct to the company's office to report him. Here she meets Eddie's father. As she is telling her troubles and making things very warm, Eddie and his bride burst into the office. Mrs. Gary then learns that Eddie is the son of the owner of the large dairy and immediately her tone changes.

LOCKED OUT (May 1).—Ned is called out of town on business. He tells Nell, his wife, that he will be gone till next morning. But finding that he can get back that same night, after all, he wires his wife to this effect. Coming out in the hall to take the telegram, she is locked out of her apartment and escapes to the roof to avoid being seen in her pajamas. In trying to get back by the fire escape, Nell is taken for a burglar. Her husband returns to find her in a compromising position. But the janitor explains, and Ned at last is pacified.

RELIANCE.

JUST KIDS (April 9).—Uncle Ned volunteers to care for little Helen and Lawrence, while his sister is away. The children lead their dignified relative a lively dance. The things that happen to him remind one of the pranks a couple of clowns in a circus might play on a third, unfortunate member. And the climax comes when seeing uncle open his safe to take out some papers, the youngsters call in the police. Uncle Ned is so surprised that he puts up a fight and gets the worst of it. At last the tangle is straightened out—and the children are packed off to their mother.

THE BURIED TREASURE (April 28).—Marie, daughter of the owner of a fishing sloop, is in love with a clam digger, Jean. Her father, however, is determined that Marie shall marry Ragout, his first mate. When Jean brings to light a chart showing the location of buried gold, the sloop owner is rather more willing to consider the clam digger as a possible son-in-law. But Ragout, overhearing, steals the chart, binds and carries Marie aboard the sloop and immediately sets sail to find and seize the treasure. Jean and the girl's father are in despair. Meeting an automobile, they prevail upon the owner to take them overland at lightning pace to the spot where lies the treasure trove. They rescue Marie and the gold. Ragout is driven from the country. And Jean and his sweetheart are married.

THE STAIN OF DISHONOR (April 19).—On the night of the dance that Col. Lane gave in honor of his daughter, Bess, his quarters were thronged with a gay and brilliant assemblage. While the couples were treading the measure of a waltz on the polished ballroom floor, the Colonel and a few of his brother officers were deep in consultation in the library. Their heads were bent over a copy of the plans for the new coast fortifications of which the Colonel had charge. When they left the library to return to the ballroom the Colonel carefully locked the plans in the top drawer of the desk.

In the conservatory Paul Greer, was pleading his love to Bess, who listened in cold silence. She had heard the same story from many men before, but the one she wanted most to speak had not declared himself. She turned to Greer and told him that there could be no love between them. After Greer left Bess remained in the conservatory thinking of Frank Barton, the man who would not speak. But a short hour later found the same Frank Barton pouring forth his tale of love to Bess in the conservatory. Bess was happy but Barton showed some contrition as he told her that he was engaged on a secret and dangerous mission and that he should not have allowed himself to speak until it was finished. While they sat talking, Greer was conferring with a stranger on the veranda in guarded tones. When the man left Greer looked cautiously about and returned to the ballroom.

Another hour passed. The library was in darkness. Aman, his face covered by a mask, stepped in through the window. He moved swiftly and silently to the desk, forced the top-drawer with deadly assurance and sorted through the contents until he found the packet he was after. This he placed in his pocket and was about to return the way he came when another man stepped in through the window. It was Barton and he held a leveled revolver at the other's head. The masked intruder was not the one to give up so easily. He drew his own weapon and fired. Barton was unhurt and returned his fire. Then the two clinched, and struggled until the man with the mask struck Barton a glancing blow on the head with the butt of the revolver. Barton dropped to the floor. The other rushed to the window to escape, but saw no officer and his partner approaching on the run. He desperately made for the door but that way was also blocked for the entire house had been aroused. Just as the Colonel, Bess and several of the officers entered the room the masked man slipped behind the door. A moment later he removed the mask and joined the others in the room. The man was Paul Greer.

Barton struggled to his feet, still dazed by the blow. The desk was rifled; the plans had disappeared, and Barton was the only one they found in the room upon entering. The Colonel accused him bitterly and searched him but no trace of the plans could be found. As Barton swayed on his feet, Bess supported him. The Colonel looked again at the desk and then gave a cry of discovery. The large

My dear Kane:

In answer to your letter of the 5th inst., I beg to inform you that up to the present writing there has been no other screen used in the Strand Theatre of New York except the Radium Gold Fibre Screen installed by you at it's opening. I believe this is the information that you require.

ink-well had been shattered by a bullet and the top of the desk covered with ink. There in the center of the blotter was the imprint of an ink-stained hand—and Barton's hands were clean. Just then Barton revived sufficiently to understand what had happened. As he glanced about the crowded room he saw Greer slipping silently toward the open door. With a cry he pointed him out. Eager hands seized the spy and brought him to the Colonel. Greer's left hand was stained with ink! In his pocket were the plans for the coast defences. Barton was cleared and as Bess joyfully embraced him, the Colonel realized the true state of affairs and gladly gave his consent to the match.

ROSE LEAVES (April 21).—Mildred's love for her rose-bushes is second only to her love for Harrison, her fiance. It is among them that he proposes and is accepted. Two years later Mildred dies, leaving Harrison with their daughter, Rose. While putting away his wife's wedding gown after the funeral, Harrison moves a vase of her favorite flowers and the petals shower over the motherless babe playing on the floor. It recalls to him the day of their engagement, and he determines to find solace in the rearing of his daughter.

Twenty years later, Harrison, high in government councils, feels keenly the long evenings alone, his daughter having recently entered society. He meets and becomes infatuated with Vera Daracq a European diplomatic agent. He neglects Rose to comply with Vera's whims. Vera, weaving a net about Harrison, is about to submit to his embrace when her sleeve catches in a rose bush and the resultant shower of petals awakens memories which cause him to temporarily lose interest in Vera. But Vera is not so easily balked, and soon has Harrison at her feet again. Rose is in love with Dick Charlton, a clerk in the State Department, but Harrison disapproves because of Dick's small salary. Dick suspects Vera's designs and asks his friend, Miller of the secret service, to investigate. Rose asks her father for money for a new gown to attend the embassy ball. Having recently purchased an expensive gift for Vera, Harrison refuses. In a forgotten trunk, Rose finds her mother's wedding gown and determines to wear it.

The night of the ball, Vera determines to force her hand. She tells Harrison if he will give her certain papers from the office of the Secretary of State, she will elope with him to Europe where they can be married. Harrison agrees. By appointment he meets Vera in the conservatory. He reaches for her to embrace her, but she steps back and his hand closes on her corsage bouquet. A handful of rose leaves sifts through his fingers. He turns and sees Rose in her mother's wedding gown, with Dick in close attendance. The resemblance to another day is striking and the revulsion of feeling complete. He turns from Vera. Vera signals her confederates and they attempt to take the papers from Harrison. But Miller has uncovered evidence sufficient to arrest the conspirators and steps in at the opportune moment. When Rose and Dick ask for Harrison's blessing, it is given freely.

THE OPEN DOOR (April 26).—Gilbert, a young man in evening dress, enters a house, the door of which stands open. In the library he comes upon a very attractive little feminine Raffles, who is helping herself to the jewels in the desk. At his command she hands over her loot, begging and imploring him not to give her up. Slipping the gems in his pocket, he tells her she may go. Just then two men come in. One is in a smoking jacket, the other in a policeman's uniform. The smoker, apparently the owner of the house, commands the policeman to take both the girl and the man in charge. They are manacled, linked together and marched away. Soon the policeman returns. "I gave them the slip down the block," he announces. "Now we must clear out of here." The wily crooks hurry into street clothes and are on the point of making their escape when several real policemen, headed by the young man in evening dress and the girl enter the house. The criminals are dragged to jail. Then Gilbert takes from the mantel a picture of himself and shows it to the girl. He, then, is the owner of the house. She looks up at him, winking back the tears. In his eyes she reads the awakening of love. The open door has proved indeed their gateway to happiness.

THANHOUSER.

THE UNDERTOW (Two Parts—April 20).—Jack, a young country boy, comes to the city to make his fortune. Upon his arrival there he falls among evil companions and through the influence of Bill (known to the police as a desperate character) and Mabel (also a well-known member of the underworld) rapidly falls lower in the social scale.

Finally in a fight with the police, the band is closely pursued on a roof of an apartment house. Jack seeks refuge in one of the apartments. This apartment is occupied by Detective Sergeant Gray and his young sister, May. The girl takes pity on Jack, who has been hounded by the police, and hides him during the search which is headed by her own brother. She makes Jack promise to reform and he breaks with Bill and Mabel, secures a position and starts out to lead an honest life again. Mabel decides to drag Jack back, but in spite of all her pleading she is unable to do so. However, a piece of cloth torn from his coat gives her the opportunity for revenge. The torn piece of cloth is given to Bill, who perpetrates a safe robbery some days later and carefully leaves the cloth behind him, an incident which results in placing the guilt upon Jack.

May believes in Jack's innocence and pleads with her brother to secure the necessary evidence to set Jack free. The detective upon investigation, has reason to believe that Jack did not commit the crime and a plan is arranged to trap Bill and Mabel. Jack apparently escapes from prison and seeks refuge at a rendezvous of Bill and Mabel's. Feeling sure that the evidence against Jack is overwhelming, they taunt him with his helplessness and tell just how the evidence was "planted," not knowing that a detective and several other officers are concealed nearby listening to their conversation. At a pre-arranged signal the officers rush out and the criminals, after a desperate struggle are captured and Jack, his innocence proven, earns his right to ask May to marry him.

FASHION AND THE SIMPLE LIFE (April 25).—A model in the cloak and suit department of a large New York store receives a comfortable salary, because of the possession of a figure which shows off to advantage the expensive gowns and suits on sale. In order to retain her position, her figure must remain sylphlike, for at the first suggestion of plumpness she is sure to be dispensed with. It was this problem which confronted a cloak model who had been in the employ of a department store for many years, and, although she still held her position, she knew that it could not be for long. A salesman for a wholesale house had paid the model many attentions but she felt that it was her stylish appearance rather than her own personality which attracted him.

The expected blow fell, and the discharged model, having saved considerable money, decided to take a vacation. She told the salesman that she was going to Florida, and boarded a train going south, but got off at a little country town in an Eastern state, where she had already made arrangements for board. There, unhampered by worry about her figure or her position, she rested and grew happier every day. The salesman also felt the need of a rest and decided to visit Florida, but on the way, the sight of a pretty country town caused him to get off the train. It chanced to be the town where the model was staying, and chance also lead him to engage board at the same house. The salesman rapidly changed into old, comfortable clothes, and strolled about the ground smoking his pipe but when he met a very comfortable, but not at all stylish woman, and recognized her as the former fashionably dressed model, he was almost dumbfounded. The model feared that her very unromantic appearance would disillusion the salesman, but to her delight, discovered that he liked comfort rather than style, and the result was that they married, bought the farm and settled down to enjoy the "simple life."

THE HANDICAP OF BEAUTY (April 23).—Mary Rush, a stenographer, is so pretty that she is obliged to constantly change her position because all her employers fall in love with her. Going to apply at the office of a young lawyer, she determines to disguise herself. She combs her hair straight back, puts on spectacles and a severely plain dress—and gets the job. One evening, after the lawyer has left, Mary, who has brought a suitcase to the office, changes her old maid make-up for her prettiest clothes, as she has planned to take dinner with Frances, her younger sister, at a restaurant. Her employer unexpectedly returns and is badly smitten with the attractive girl, whom he takes to be his stenographer's sister. Next day he begs permission to call. He finds Mary at home in her soberest rags. "Little Sister" is out. Then the phone rings and they learn that Frances is about to marry the man of her choice at the office of the justice of the peace. Determined to stop the ceremony at any cost, Mary hurries into a very becoming hat and coat, and her employer calls a taxi. When she takes off her spectacles he recognizes the girl who has fascinated him the evening before. In the taxi the lawyer loses no time in getting to the point. Arrived at the city hall, they find "Little Sister" already married to a young man by no means so bad as Mary's horrified fancy had painted him, and the justice is persuaded to perform the service all over again for the newcomers.

MAJESTIC.

THE STORY OF A STORY (April 20).—An author with talent has trouble in disposing of it; another author prostitutes his gifts by writing and selling books that show a wrong, distorted viewpoint of life. The poor author refuses to write such bad books and severely reprimands his daughter, whom he finds just starting to read one.

Times become very hard and he is tempted to sacrifice his ideals. He writes such a morbid novel and is ashamed. He falls asleep, exhausted, across his desk. He dreams his book is in covers and that a little girl, tired of poverty and lack of good times, has read it. Out of its pages step the little girl and man, characters of the story, and take the poor girl, May, along with them to show her life (according to the author), as it should be lived. The author sees in his dream, May ruined and disgraced by the man in his book. She is denied refuge by her mother. Passing a photographer's, sees there a photo of the author. She destroys this in a rage and tells the owner that he (the author) has betrayed and ruined her. She then goes to her room and turns on the gas.

The dream is over; the author still asleep. His daughter tiptoes in and takes his manuscript from the desk and starts to read. The author wakes, his dream still vivid, and sees his daughter starting to read his manuscript. He snatches it from her, telling her that it was not finished. After she has gone—"That is the best ending" he says as he watches it burn. Then he sits down at his desk again and starts to write a better and sweeter and truer story.

FOR THE HONOR OF BETTINA (Two Parts—April 25).—Old Giuseppi makes plaster statues and his little granddaughter, Bettina, sells them. Above in the tenement lives Antonio, who plays his violin in a cheap cafe. Across the hall lives an Italian girl of another type, Marina. Antonio loves Bettina but has never spoken to her. The girl across the hall tends a flower stand and so meets many men. One night she makes an engagement with one and he asks her to bring a friend. She lends Bettina some clothes and coaxes her to go with her. They are taken to the cafe where Tony plays. Tony is more hurt than jealous; and after the supper when the men take them in an auto to a road house, he waits up in the tenement until the girl returns and reproaches Marina.

Bettina resents Tony's interference and there arises a coolness between them. The next day Tony goes to the cafe with his friend, Talio, an Italian plain-clothes man. To his horror Bettina and her companion of the previous evening, enter and are shown to a private room. Tony is resolved to protect her at any cost. He listens at the door and during the waiter's absence Bettina's escort is forcing Bettina to receive his attentions. He forces the door; there is a fight between the two men and the escort is killed. Tony's friend, the detective, rushes in and saves his friend by arranging the evidence to show that the man was a suicide. Bettina and Tony are reconciled and the little Italian girl is satisfied to remain in her own station, and we are led to believe that Tony will eventually be the lifelong custodian of the honor of Betina.

CHECKMATE (April 27).—Tom and Arthur, two friends, are employed, respectively, as wire chief for the telephone company, and as telegraph operator for Burton Gray, a stock broker. Tom meets Gray's ward, Dorothy, and is greatly attracted. Dorothy never has seen her father. He had placed her in Gray's care as a baby, refusing to see her because her birth had cost her mother her life. And he had given Gray a sum of money to be handed to Dorothy upon her coming of age, or in the event she should marry. Gray uses the money in speculation, and it is lost. Dorothy's father, outgrowing his antipathy to his daughter, wires Gray that he is coming to take the girl in charge. Her guardian, knowing that Dorothy loves him, determines to persuade her to marry him in order to avoid the discovery of the misappropriation of the funds. Tom overhears Gray engaging train accommodations and is suspicious. Then, finding the telegram from Dorothy's father, he accuses his employer. Gray knocks Tom down and ties him up with a wire from an electric drop light. Though bound, the young man manages to pull a telephone from the desk, and using the receiver as a key, he telegraphs for help. The flashing light at central puzzles the operator, who summons Arthur, the wire chief. Arthur rushes to Tom's assistance, and they pursue Gray. Tom boards the train, which already is in motion, and when Gray attempts to throw him off, Dorothy summons help. The young man shows Dorothy her father's telegram and tells her his story. She is convinced of her guardian's stratagem. Eventually she and Tom are married.

AMERICAN.

THE DAY OF RECKONING (Two Parts—April 26).—Deceived by Carl Burton, a gambler and sporting character, into believing that they have been honorably married, Martha True, an innocent young woman, is brutally left by the designing man to bear her disgrace alone. When her child is born, she loves it with super-maternal passion, but in order to secure employment it is necessary to place the child in the care of a woman friend, and her only recompense in life is the week-end visits made to see her baby. Unable to stand the strain of work and the sorrow of being separated from her child, Martha is overcome while behind the counter of a department store and is taken to a hospital by the kind-hearted bachelor owner of the business, who does all he can for her comfort. As the girl is recovering, her employer is a daily visitor to the hospital and gradually falls in love with her.

When John Walton proposes a great temptation was put before the girl, but she finally decided to marry him and give her child a home by having the woman who is caring for her baby send a letter which Martha has written herself, asking that the child be sent to Martha's care as her friend is dying. The letter comes in due time and the big hearted husband welcomes the idea of having a child in the house. In the meantime, Carl Burton learns of the deception played on the husband and sends an adventuress, Rita Marr, with a letter, threatening to expose Martha to her husband unless her prosperity is shared with the blackmailing pair. Martha, fearing that her husband will discover her secret and never forgive her, decides to take her child and leave the house, but in the midst of her preparations her husband returns. At first he is loath to forgive her, but after hearing the whole story, his love for his wife and adopted child is too great and all are united in a happy home, much to the discomfort of the blackmailers.

WANTED—A WIFE (April 28).—Tired of bachelorhood, Andy Fortune resorts to a "want ad" to secure a wife and receives replies from willing women of all ages and color. In one envelope there is enclosed a photo of a bathing girl and the challenge "Find me," which meets with Andy's romantic nature. Consequently he goes to Miramar Beach in search of the original and on several occasions thinks he has found her, but each time is disappointed.

J. D. P. Moore and his daughter, Ruth, are also staying at the beach and become acquainted with Count Raphio, whom her father thinks would make a good match for his daughter. Ruth objects, declaring that her choice must be a man and not a title. Ruth, hearing of the manner in which Andy had saved a young girl from drowning, informs her father that the man she marries must be heroic and fearless and the father decides to make a hero out of the Count. Ruth is to be attacked by a gang in the Count's employ while this worthy gentleman, stationed nearby, is to accomplish her rescue. The stage is all set and all would have been well had not circumstances under which he had no control prevented the Count from fulfilling his part of the arrangement. However, the girl is rescued by Andy who sees the attack and rushes to the rescue. While the ruffians are taking their vengeance out on the Count. Andy recognizes the girl of the picture who promises to become his wife.

NO QUARTER (April 27).—Mrs. Smith's gas and electric light bills being exorbitant, she is advised by the clerk at the company's office to have prepaid meters installed which require 25 cent pieces to operate. Later the Smiths give a dinner in honor of their daughter, Peggy, whose engagement to Reggie Ruggles has been announced. While the dinner is in preparation, the supply of gas gives out and the frantic Mrs. Smith appeals to the guests for a quarter in change. Not being able to get one, she tries to use a button in the meter without success. The arrival of the gas company's trouble man does not help matters, as he finds the button stuck in the meter slot and Mrs. Smith's pleadings prove of no avail against this breach of company rules. However, by the use of an inverted electric iron and the dining-room fireplace the food is served, considerably scorched and burnt, to the now anxious guests, but the horrified hostess is

And those exhibitors whose letters we quote, attest to the superiority of Kriterion Service.

Such expressions as are contained in these testimonials have a convincing ring to them.

They are but a few picked at random. We print them in proof of our many statements that Kriterion Service is highly pleasing to both exhibitors and patrons.

They speak not only well of Kriterion pictures, but also of Kriterion advertising matter. Every theatre owner knows that half the battle of getting people to coming to the theatre is the advertising material used. Then to have the pictures fulfill your advertised promises is securing the faith of the public.

Read these over carefully, undoubtedly one or the other of them will answer some question that has come into your mind concerning Kriterion.

I have run the KRITERION Service the past week, and found it to be very satisfactory in every respect. The two reel features are exceptionally fine, and the photography, production, etc., entirely up to the standard. The comedies are also very good. Taken as a whole, the service is as good as any on the market in my estimation.

Respectfully yours,
HOWARD G. CARROLL, Mgr.
International Theatre, Niagara Falls, N. Y.

I want to say to you that I am more than pleased with your service so far, and you have the best showing of advertising matter of any service I have run yet.

Wishing you the best of success, I am,
Very respectfully yours,
JOHN GALLAGHER,
Lyric Theatre, Newark, Ohio.

I never in my experience in the show business have received as good a selection of subjects, every one having a cause for the making of it, especially the dramas, which were far above the average, each and every one having a good punch. If your paper will not pull people into a house there is something radically wrong with the neighborhood or the house.

Looking forward to my next week's program and wishing you the success that you deserve, believe me to be,
A Kriterion Booster, L. ISRAEL,
Main Theatre, Cleveland, Ohio.

Although I am a new man in the game, I have heard many of my patrons say that I have shown the highest class and cleanest pictures that have ever been shown in our city, and can see new ones come each evening, and will say that if I am able to put this house on a paying basis it will be largely due to your good Service, for which I am so far very grateful. Yours very truly,
IRA W. WEST,
Rex Theatre, Oberlin, O.

The comedy was refined, the drama strong and appealing, and held me spellbound. Another thing I noticed was that the photography is exceptionally clear and the settings are distinctively the best I have ever seen in a regular service.

Yours very cordially,
F. J. REMBUSH,
Fountain Theatre, Terre Haute, Ind.

Paper, none better. Drama, A-1 in every respect. Plenty of action and good photography, and your comedies are good, clean subjects, with a laugh in every one.

Yours very truly,
H. W. DIRMEYER, Mgr.
Princess Theatre, Cleveland, Ohio.

I was certainly more than pleased with the pictures that you had been sending me, and what is more important, my patrons also are more than satisfied and are showing their satisfaction by filling my house. You have the three requirements for good pictures. Splendid photography, acting and setting.

Hoping that both your success and mine may continue, I am, Yours very truly,
SAM BARCK, Owner,
Market Square Theatre, Cleveland, O.

The service that we have been getting is satisfactory in every way, both dramas and comedies, and I trust that they will keep to the standard that they have set for themselves. Yours truly,
HILDA REARK,
Theatorium, 710 Market St., Sandusky, O.

nearly prostrated to note that the electric lights incline to dimness.

As the health of the guests of honor is being drank the room becomes totally dark, but lucky, a tardy arrival is able to supply the needed "quarter." As the lights are turned on, several events are shown whose tragic results are the breaking of Peggy's engagement and a breach between her maiden aunt and the portly retired farmer who is courting her. The sudden illumination shows Reggie holding the hand of the maid servant in mistake for Peggy's and the supposed temperate Mr. Meeker, tossing off a glass of liquor with gusto. The next day a letter to the daily papers recalling the invitations for Peggy's wedding is dispatched by Mr. Smith with instructions not to forget to mail them, but the necessity of laying in a quantity of quarters takes him to the bank and he forgets to mail the letter. In the meantime a doctor has prescribed sherry and egg for the weeping Peggy and the maiden aunt is sent for the wine, where she is discovered by Mr. Meeker, her beau, who chides her about her purchases and gains her forgiveness. The penitent Reggie calls with a bouquet for his sweetheart and is ushered into her presence by the servant. He receives a pardon as Mr. Smith returns with a supply of coins for the meters, which caused all the trouble.

BRONCHO.

THE RENEGADE (Two Parts—April 28).—Robert Graves, a renegade slave trader of Africa, defeats a party of British soldiers sent to capture him and takes as prisoner Captain Marley. On Captain Marley he discovers a letter which notifies him (Marley) that he is heir to the estates of the Earl of Craven. Graves determines to impersonate Marley, which he does, after selling Marley into slavery to Ali-Hamid, an Arabian Sheik. Graves sails for England and takes up the duties of the estate, planning to marry Alice Craven, as per the dying request of the old Earl. Alice distrusts him, however, and is in love with a young man in the neighborhood.

Marley is taken to the Sheik's home, where he falls in love with Normah, a beautiful slave girl and a favorite of the Sheik. Normah helps Marley to escape upon his promising to return and purchase her from Ali-Hamid. He sails for England and at the suggestion of the old family lawyer, he appears in the bedroom of Graves, as the latter lies in a drunken sleep. Graves awakens, thinks he sees the ghost of Marley and, overcome with terror, jumps from the bedroom window and is instantly killed. Alice and the young Englishman marry, and Marley sits in the garden and dreams of returning to Arabia for Normah.

KAY-BEE.

THE RIDDLE OF THE WOODEN LEG (Two Parts—April 23).—Sauntry, secretary to John Graydon, the wealthy banker, does a lot of burglarizing in the city among the wealthy class, attaining quite a sinister fame. He disguises his foot prints by attaching a wooden leg over one of his good ones, thus leaving one foot print and a round mark.

The Graydon diamond disappears and the chain to which it was attached is found by Limpy Fisher, a boy of the East Side, with a peg leg. When Limpy offers the chain for sale at an East Side saloon, it is purchased by a stool pigeon, who takes it to the police headquarters and tells the chief he has located the famous "wooden legged" burglar. Limpy is arrested, although declaring his innocence.

A few days later, Edith Lee, a noted scientific detective, goes to Mr. Graydon and offers her services in the effort to find the burglar. She takes her place in Graydon's house, disguised as a maid, and in a short time traces the burglaries to Sauntry. A trap is set for him and the famous diamond found buried in a house plant in the Graydon home. Sauntry confesses and Limpy is released.

DOMINO.

THE ARTIST'S MODEL (Two Parts—April 22).—De Dion, a wealthy, successful artist, with an evil reputation among his women models, gives an evening reception in his magnificent studio to his society friends and art patrons. Marie Mazzini, a poor artist's model, and her mother live in a tenement. Richard Kenton, another artist, advertises for an Italian model. Marie answers the ad and secures the position. As the painting progresses Kenton falls in love with the girl and she with him, and he believes that the picture will prove to be his masterpiece. He is penniless himself and is forced to pawn his watch to pay the girl her first week's salary. He accidentally drops the pawn ticket and Marie, finding it, realizes the extent of his sacrifice. She returns the ticket to Kenton and offers to take only part of the money and have Kenton pay her the balance later. Kenton refuses the offer in a kindly manner.

Kenton is unable to sell the completed painting. De Dion sees Marie dining with Kenton and, struck with her beauty, resolves to possess her. He offers her work as a model at extravagant wages. Kenton warns Marie of De Dion's evil reputation but in order to help Kenton she poses for him in secret. De Dion treats Marie with courtesy at first, and she begins to believe Kenton was wrong in his deductions. One evening Marie is lured to De Dion's studio by a ruse to the effect that her mother has been hurt in an automobile accident and carried there. Marie discovers the plot to lure her there, but De Dion and his servant prevent her departure. De Dion has prepared a dinner in the studio. Marie's mother calls up the studio but De Dion tells her Marie is not there. The mother goes to Kenton to help her locate Marie. Kenton suspects De Dion may have something to do with Marie's departure. He sends the mother home and races for De Dion's studio.

Meantime De Dion, seeing that Marie will not obey his wishes voluntarily, uses force and attempts to overpower her. Kenton arrives at the critical moment. De Dion gets a revolver and tries to kill Kenton but the latter wrenches the weapon from De Dion and hits him over the head with it, knocking him unconscious. Kenton helps Marie from the studio, leaving De Dion slowly returning to consciousness.

CAPTAIN MACKLIN (Four Parts—Majestic—April).—Grandson of a famous officer, Royal Macklin is dismissed from West Point and immediately sets sail to fight in Honduras, leaving his cousin, Beatrice, who loves him, inconsolable. Arriving, he meets Gen. Laguerre, the famous soldier of fortune, through Aiken, the American Vice Consul, and is made a captain in the revolutionary army. His strict discipline is unpopular, but he makes efficient troops out of those fighting President Alverez in order to make General Garcia president.

Garcia has just been ousted from the Presidency because he insisted that the Isthmian Line, of which Joseph Fiske is owner, pay taxes. The line promptly organized a revolt and made Alvarez president. In the course of the march on the capitol, Macklin performs some daring deeds of soldiery. Garcia turns traitor, but Laguerre and Macklin capture the chief city, where Macklin meets Mary Fiske, daughter of the Isthmian Line's head. Involved in a duel with her brother, he refuses to fire and is wounded himself. Through a traitor, Laguerre and Macklin are betrayed and defeated, but they manage to save the Fisks.

MAN'S PREROGATIVE (Majestic—Four Parts—April).—Oliver and Elizabeth wed. He is a famous lawyer—careless of his personal conduct, but has implicit faith in Elizabeth. She is a woman of strong mind, a magazine writer of repute, and believes he should guide himself by the same code that governs her.

Two of their associates are profligates, Charles, an artist, and Catherine. Oliver trifles with Catherine and this so embitters Elizabeth, that she pretends to receive the attentions of Charles, although it is made clear that she has remained pure. Nevertheless, she purposely permits her husband to believe otherwise.

He has considered her like Caesar's wife, but his faith is shattered. A child is born to her and the father doubts its parentage. Worse than this, society also believes her guilty. A divorce separates Oliver from Elizabeth. She is ostracized with her child. In the end the evidence of her purity, which she had purposely concealed, becomes known to Oliver through the dying confession of Charles, and the husband and wife are reconciled and Elizabeth is vindicated, but only after she has seen and regretted the folly of her rebellion against the first law of society. The death of their child plays a large part.

ON THE NIGHT STAGE (Five Parts—New York Motion Picture Corp.—April).—Belle Shields, a dance hall girl, who is the sweetheart of Texas Smith, the silent road agent, is much taken with Austin, the new parson who comes to town. The cowboys joke and kid Texas about the parson cutting him out and a fight follows. Austin, who learned more at school than theology, comes to Texas' assistance, rescues him in a smashing set-to and they become fast friends. Austin and Belle are married, but Texas keeps a watchful eye on Belle so that she will not side-step. Soon Belle makes a visit to a nearby town, and, in a spirit of recklessness, attends the dance hall. Jack Malone, who is very much the lady's man, decides that he must have Belle and immediately takes possession of her. It is when they are standing at the bar about to take a drink and Jack kisses her, that Belle awakens to what she is about to do. She immediately returns home, but Jack is undaunted and sends her a letter telling her that he will expect to meet her at the cross roads that night.

She confides her troubles to Texas, who holds up the night stage, taking Jack out. He walks him across the desert and is about to turn him loose, when Jack wheels around and fires. Texas is too quick for him, however, and Jack is shot and killed. Texas returns to the Austin cabin, then, feeling that he has repaid Parson Austin by saving his wife for him.

The Chinaman's report is unfavorable.

Choo, too, loves Betty, but she accepts Ogden, after saving him from being lynched as a horse thief. She conceals him in her own room and cures him of the morphine habit. When he is well he says he will go back to his people, get money to marry her and return in three days. On his way out, Taylor, In a jealous rage, shoots at him, but hits and kills the Colonel. Betty believes Ogden has done this, and plans to revenge herself by betraying him to the ranchmen. She makes them promise not to seize him until she has seen him.

"I will ring the bell three three times," she says. "Then you can come and lynch him."

All Ogden's protestations are unavailing till Taylor comes in and in a drunken temper reveals himself as the murderer. Choo arrives just in time to save the couple. Taylor he kills with a knife, and when Betty and Ogden have left he rings the bell three times. The ranchmen find him there calmly smoking a cigarette.

All that is good in the latter comes to the surface and thinking of Peggy, he handcuffs himself to the prostrate officer and brings him back to the police launch where he is held with the rest of the prisoners. The harbor is rid of the thieves which have terrorized the people along the water front and Ryan is promoted for his bravery. Skipper Wilson, now proud of his future son-in-law, smiles happily as the two emerge from the shadows of the harbor and plight their troth.

General Director, Mr. Gaston Mervale

closes it in an envelope on which he writes: "Not to be opened until after my death," and places it in a book on the library table. In another note addressed "To My Anxious Relatives" he writes, "To that one of you who finds my will I bequeath this house and $100,000.00." On his way to the country his valise, which was carelessly attached to the automobile, falls off unseen by Uncle. Charlie, a passerby, sees it, picks it up and goes home with it. Helen, Jabez's niece, who has made herself mistress of the household, in exploring her Uncle's home in quest of his will, finds the note "To My Anxious Relatives." She starts out to find the will and is soon joined in her search by all the relations, and the chairs, tables, desks, buffets, hat racks and everything that tends to hinder the progress are thrown pell-mell in all directions.

In the meantime, Charlie, having been called away on business to the coast, takes Uncle Jabez's suitcase with him. A collision occurs in which Charlie is killed. There being nothing else to identify him except the valise, the newspaper reporters record his name as "Jabez Smart." Uncle Jabez reads of the accident, and, knowing his relations better than they think, he decides to return to his home before they find the will. While everything is in a state of confusion at his home, Jabez enters and finds his relatives at their work. They sneakily exit, leaving Uncle Jabez to brood over his wrecked home.

THE GIRL WITH THE CAMERA (Premier—April 20).—Edythe—a camera expert—is sent out by her father, the sheriff, to track down two "moonshiners" who are operating a still in his county. In crossing a stream, Edythe drops her camera and as she stoops to get it, a stranger, who has stopped for a drink at the stream, helps her. Edythe seeing that he resembles her description one of the "moonshiners" snaps his picture and follows him to his shack, then starts back to tell her father. The stranger, meanwhile, decides to stop "moonshining" hoping that the "Purty Gal" he met that day will like him better if he does. Headed by Edythe, the sheriff and his men start out to get the two law-breakers. Edythe goes ahead to scout with the understanding that they will follow when she shoots. She is attacked by Dan, Bill's surly partner, but is saved by Bill, who hears her screams. Dan tries to shoot Bill. Edythe pulls her gun and fires, but the shot hits Bill. The posse hears and runs on. Tacked on the door of his cabin, the sheriff and his men find Bill's resolutions to abandon "moonshining" in the note to his partner saying that he is through with the business, since "The Good Book says so, and so does the purtiest gal you ever saw."

THE ROOM BETWEEN (Empress—Two Parts—April 21).—Having married Hal Eastman, a man of wealth and position, at her father's dying request, Blanche Marvin is not content to give up her friendship for Ned Burton, a former lover. Burton is included in her parties, which increases in gayety with each succeeding one until one day when her husband finds Blanche in Burton's arms. Hal decides that they shall separate and live in apartments in opposite sides of the house with a large room between which shall be common property. Eastman finds a baby boy in his car one night which proves later to be the child of a poor young woman whose husband he has befriended. He adopts the child, not knowing who it is, and engages the mother as a nurse. Matters between Blanche and Hal come to a crisis when Blanche discovers the presence of the child, and they each, unknown to each other, move from the house. Divorce proceedings start, but the final separation is averted and Hal and Blanche are brought together again. The child is returned to its parents, and great happiness come to Hal and Blanche in helping the working man and his wife re-establish their home.

YOU NEED A DOCTOR (Starlight— April 22).—Hans and Heinie are broke. Hans concludes that, having once been a horse doctor, he can cure human beings. He brews bacterium of a disease called the jumps. They innoculate the folk of a village with the jumps, and hang out a sign specializing cure for Jumps. Their office is besieged. They make instant cures and incidentally a barrel of money but their trick is finally exposed. They are arrested, and jailed much to their discomfiture, but to the amusement of those who witness this wonderful get-rich scheme of Hans and Heinie.

HER NEW YOB (Luna—April 22).—Owing to the mischievous pranks of Dorothea and Raymond Thatcher, nine and seven years old, Mrs. Thatcher is confronted by a serious servant problem. Maids will not stay in the house with them, until Lebia, a good-natured Swedish girl who loves children, arrives just as the mother is in despair. Lebia enjoys their mischief and laughs her way into the children's hearts.

One evening Mrs. Thatcher entertains the Humane Society at an evening party. The children cannot miss the good fun of dressing Lebia up for the occasion. When she appears in the drawing room to serve the refreshments clad in a red and white table cloth and with feathers in her hair, the outraged hostess is very angry, although the guests see the humor of the situation. To save Lebia from too severe a scolding, the children confess their fault and beg for forgiveness. When it has been granted, they carry off their good-hearted maid to the kitchen and the left over goodies which are waiting for them.

MORE AND MORE (Empress—April 23).—After an anxious time of waiting in the office of. Dr. Wurstfurter, the news at last comes to Heinie over the wire that the stork has arrived at his home. Immediately he calls his friend, Charlie, and asks him to bring all the boys over to see the heir. Upon their arrival, Heinie takes them to the room to see the precious child, but when, upon opening he sees not one but two—then three, four and finally five babies, it is too much for him to stand. He faints, and while he is unconscious he goes to a land of dreams which abounds in babies of every description. In his excitement, dreaming they are all his, he falls off the lounge, awakens and rushes from the house, apparently never to return again.

THE PARASITE'S DOUBLE (Lariat—Two Parts—April 24).—"The Parasite" makes his last raid on the village bank and escapes to the hills. When the reward for his capture is posted, along comes his double, a stranger of questionable character, who, upon seeing the reward card and photograph of his prototype, fears that he may be taken for the original and shaves off his beard. "The Parasite," too, returns to the village, clean shaven, at the time when his double takes advantage of an old miner's inebriety to rob him of his gold. "The Parasite" checkmates his rival's movements in the little community, and, going to the sheriff of an adjoining county, where he, himself, is wanted for numerous deeds of outlawry, is made a deputy. He immediately sets to work to "get" his rival, the murderer of his sweetheart's father, and the working out of the love episode between "The Parasite" and the orphaned girl makes this two part western drama a real live "thriller."

LOVE THY NEIGHBORS (United—April 25).—A fight between Paddy Monahan and Tony Picotti results in a hair-pulling contest between their mothers. The Angel of Peace enters in the form of Grandpa Monahan, a war veteran, who proceeds to tell the assembled neighbors what real war is. He grows so enthusiastic that he raises his cane like a sword and brings it down on a neighbor's head, at the same time poking Percy in the stomach with his crutch. A general fight follows. At the same time, in the coal mine, Monahan and Picotti come to blows. The Italian warns the Irishman against the Black Hand. Trouble begins for the superstitious Irishman. He encounters the imprints of a black hand left by a coal dealer on the newly-painted door sill of the saloon on the way home, enters and fights with the white washer on whose coat the coal man has left another hand mark. He gets home and finds black hand marks on Percy's shirt bosom which were put there by Grandpa, who forgetfully slapped Percy on the chest after handling the stove lid. Monahan puts Percy out the window into the rain barrel. Madeline rushes to his aid, wraps him in a sheet and puts his clothes on the line. Paddy is sent to the shed as punishment for fighting. He sees Percy, whom he thinks is a ghost, and rushes out. The neighbors are terrified. Monahan received a warning that he must die the next night from the Black Hand. The tragedy, however, is averted and neighborhood peace restored by a series of side-splitting incidents.

THE NEW EXPLOITS OF ELAINE NO. 1 (17th episode "The Watching Eye"—Two Parts—April 19).—In Wu Fang and Long Sin, Craig Kennedy seems to have found an opposition worthy of his tempered metal. With Elaine kidnapped, and no clue to work on but a meaningless sryptic ring, the great scientific detective feels the necessity for his most concentrated thought. Aunt Josephine is the recipient of a huge vase, at the bottom of which Kennedy finds a note from Elaine, saying that she is as yet unharmed, and instructing him, if he would save her, to deliver the cryptic ring that night in an appointed place. Kennedy forges a ring the counterpart of the original, hoping thereby to trick the crafty Chinamen; but out from the side of the gigantic vase peers the crafty eye of the artful heathen, and unknown to him, Kennedy's plans are blighted in the making. Events then follow quickly. Kennedy in trying to double-cross the Tongs, is himself checkmated, and barely escapes with his life when he goes to barter the fake ring for Elaine. The ring, however, proves the "Open Sesame" to the underground treasure vault of the late Clutching Hand, although a small comfort in consideration of Elaine's probable fate.

HE TAKES WELL AT PARTIES (April 19-24).—When those two geniuses of humor, Buddy and Percy, receive an invitation to the reception of Jeanette Dupree their joy is complete. Setting forth to celebrate their social conquest, they run amuck of a cop who proceeds to make life miserable for them. Escaping the clutches of the law, they enter a cafe, but their jinx is still with them. They get in a scrap with several of the patrons, but lose the decision by a mile.

They then proceed to the home of Jeanette, mingling with the guests as though they had been doing it all their lives. But they're like the bull in a china shop and destruction follows in their wake. At dinner, learning that the chef has gone on a strike, they volunteer to serve instead. Ye gods! what a mess! At the height of the excitement, one of the diners shouts that she has been robbed. Suspicion points to Buddy and Percy. One of their accusers is Buddy's rival who is most emphatic in his accusations. Percy, however, discovers this particular party removing a necklace from another of the guests and informs Buddy.

In answer to the request of their hostess to entertain the other guests, Buddy and Percy agree to do some parlor tricks. They pursuade the thief to act as their "subject" and place him in a chair on a platform. Tying his feet tightly together, they inform the audience that they will secure all the missing jewelry. Their victim endeavors to beat it, but they have him dead to rights. From every pocket of his clothes they take some piece of jewelry. The guests, realizing the service which Buddy and Percy have rendered them, shower the heroes with every attention.

TOLEDO—PICTURESQUE SPAIN (April 19-24).—To view this film is to take a trip back through bygone centuries when Spain held a dominant position in the Old World. Toledo, the subject of this offering, is famous in history, and was, subsequent to Roman and Gothic occupancy, a center of great renown. It is also celebrated for its sword blades of extraordinary temper and beauty.

The many well constructed roads and arched bridges are a lasting tribute to the rulers of other days. There is something very fascinating about the ancient ruins which so grimly combat the ravages of time. For instance, there is the Cathedral, begun in 1277, a structure of wonderful architecture and historical statuary, which still stands as a tribute to the skill of the artisans of old.

ARMY ENGINEERS (France—On the same reel as foregoing—April 19-24).—This picture gives a very comprehensive portrayal of the manner in which the army engineers set about to erect a military bridge. Step by step the construction is shown, from the time the piers or supports are placed in position until it is inspected and passed by the officials in charge.

THE LILY OF POVERTY FLAT (California Motion Picture Corporation—April 26).—Joe meets "The Lily of Poverty Flat" one afternoon, when he boards the stage from Marysville to the mining camp, and finds that the only occupant, besides the driver and the express-messenger, is the beautiful girl, returning to her father, John Folinsbee, the owner of the store at Poverty Flat. On the way, while they walk up a grade, with the stage ahead of them, a band of Indians attack the coach, killing both the driver and express-messenger. Lily and Joe, left on the road, are ignorant of what has taken place. While Joe seeks in the brush for water for Lily, he finds an Indian endeavoring to capture or slay Lily. Joe kills him and returns without telling the girl what he has done. When the Vigilantes arrive, Joe leaves Lily with them and rides on to Poverty Flat. After he is gone, the dead Indian is discovered, and Lily realizes that Joe, whom she had almost ignored, was her modest savior.

For the dance, which is held in her honor, Lily sends an invitation to Joe by the half-breed Mexican porter of her father's store, Sanchez. Dolores, a Spanish woman, is infatuated with Joe, and Sanchez, who is in love with her, stops at her cottage to show her the note from Lily. Dolores plies him with liquor, detaining him so that, when the note is finally delivered Joe has to swim the flooded North Fork in order to get to the dance in time. Annoyed by the attentions paid to his daughter by the impecunious young miner, Folinsbee tells him that he has no chance until he makes his "stake." A half-interest in the supposedly worthless Mammoth Mine has been foisted on Folinsbee by Lotski, a schemer. Culpepper, nephew of Colonel Starbottle, who drew up the papers, is in love with Sadie, Lotski's daughter. Culpepper finds indications that the mine is really valuable, and Lotski promises him his daughter's hand, if he will discover some way to fleece Folinsbee out of his share. Just when Culpepper finds a flaw in the deed, Folinsbee discovers the richness of the mine and, on the strength of this, he plans a trip to Europe. Lily objects, as she wants to remain near Joe. She meets him secretly and tells him that, despite their new riches, she will remain true to him.

An Indian maid, twice befriended by Joe, has been left a map of a fabulously rich "Lost Mine" by her dying grand-parent. Learning that poverty is keeping him from marrying the girl of his choice, she seeks him out to give him the secret. Her meeting with Joe is observed by the jealous Dolores, who takes advantage of this to make Lily believe that Joe is untrue to her. Lily, grief-stricken, hurriedly changes her plans and agrees to go to Europe immediately. She leaves a note which plunges Joe in deep woe, made even more unbearable by the knowledge that Hamlin, the gambler and suitor for Lily's hand, is to make the journey with the Folinsbees. In Paris Lily, thanks to the lavishness of her father, is installed the belle of the season, and is courted by the Count de Brie, who has advanced her father a large sum of money. Lily's heart is still Joe's, however, and there seems no chance for this titled lover, until news of the flaw in the deed strikes the family like a thunderbolt. Lily, in order to save her father from prosecution, offers to become the Count's bride. Hamlin, to save her from this sacrifice, plays the first crooked game of cards in his life with the Count and wins enough money to pay the debt for Folinsbee. The swindle is discovered by the Count, Hamlin is challeneged to a duel, which ends in a wound for the gambler, the latter firing in the air, determined not to add bloodshed to his first fault. Then the Folinsbees and Hamlin return to Poverty Flat.

When the party arrives at Marysville on the way home, Joe is with a posse in pursuit of a gang of robbers, whose leader, it has been learned, is Sanchez, now an outlaw. Through a stratagem, Joe is kidnapped by the bandits and hurried through the woods to a secret Indian camp. A note is left by Sanchez, demanding a heavy ransom for Joe. This is found by the Indian maid just as Hamlin and Lily ride up the road, having left Lily's parents to rest at Marysville. Hamlin instructs Lily and the Indian Girl to go on to Poverty Flat, and he rides on hard to catch up with the robbers. Lily disobeys instructions and, with the Indian maid, makes her way by a cut-off to the secret Indian camp, the rendezvous of the gang. Here Joe has been carried across a bridge over the ravine and thrust into a hut on a narrow ledge. Hamlin, on his arrival, opens fire on the robbers, killing one. Sanchez dashes across the bridge and engages Hamlin in a savage encounter. Lily and the Indian maid, having seen the affray from a cliff overlooking the hut, start down the precipice, when the remaining bandit shoots and kills the Indian girl. Before he can shoot Lily, Hamlin disengages himself from Sanchez long enough to shoot him. Sanchez deals Hamlin a death wound with his knife. Lily, having clambered down to the hut, releases Joe. The two cross the bridge in time for the dying Hamlin to unite the hands of the lovers.

THE GOVERNOR'S LADY (Lasky-Belasco).—At the opening of the story Daniel Slade is working in a mine and, though not positively in need, he and his wife live in comparative poverty. Slade is a man filled with ambition, but his wife is contented and absorbed in her love for her husband. By a fortunate accident he discovers a gold mine and, with his newly acquired wealth, immediately sets out to make a position of influence for himself in the world. His aggressive personality and ability at once attract attention, these qualities being combined with wealth, and the possibilities of a political career are pointed out to him by Senator Strickland.

Slade has no sooner established himself in his new surroundings than he comes to feel that his wife does not know how to take advantage of their altered circumstances. She is still the same simple, home-loving person. In the course of time he becomes attracted to the Senator's daughter, who, like himself, is of ambitious temperament. In fact, though she does not love him, she agrees to marry him if he obtains a divorce from his wife. The concluding episodes of the story show how the wife rescues her husband from his unpardonable folly, and how, much chastened, he finally persuades her to come back to him. He has now become the chief executive of the State and Mary at last takes her place as the Governor's Lady.

THE COMMANDING OFFICER (Famous Players).—Captain Waring, the young officer, second in command, tries to borrow money from the commandant to pay a long-overdue debt, but is refused. He appeals to Brent Lindsay, the lion of an adjacent mining town. Lindsay accepts Waring's note for the loan. Major Bingham, retired, and his daughter, Floyd, live at the military post, and both Waring and Lindsay are courting Floyd. Lindsay utilizes the note to force Waring to withdraw his attentions to the girl. Floyd thus becomes interested in Lindsay, but when she hears of an affair he has with a common dance hall woman called "Queen," she accepts the commandant's proposal of marriage, a course urged by her father, who detests Lindsay. The commandant is the guardian of two children left by his dead sister. After Floyd's marriage to the commandant Lindsay continues his attentions, as a result of which the commandant quarrels with his wife and then, piqued, leaves for a hunting trip to the mountains. In his absence his wife commits the folly of walking in the woods with Lindsay. Lindsay embraces her and Captain Waring, who is out with his camera, happens on in time to take a photograph of the young wife in Lindsay's arms. Waring uses the photograph to recover the note from Lindsay. They quarrel, and shortly after Lindsay is discovered killed. Circumstances point to the commandant as the murderer. He, in turn, thinks his wife is guilty. The commandant is turned over to the sheriff, and while in custody is attacked by the infuriated men of the mining town, but is rescued by one of his companions and exonerated by the "Queen," who witnessed the murder and now comes forth with a true version of the tragedy. From this point everything is explained, and the commanding officer consequently realizes the innocence of his wife.

WHEN WE WERE TWENTY-ONE (Famous Players—Five Parts—April).—Richard Audaine, known for his mad pranks as "The Imp," is at once the idol and the torment of his loving guardian's heart. In the prologue of the action, which occurs some twenty years before the action of the play, Dick Carew, a steady-going barrister, receives a letter from a dying friend containing a request that he and "The Trinity," as three of their mutual friends were termed, adopt the little orphan son of the writer, baby Richard Audaine. These four men, though not very wealthy, vow together to carry out the terms of the letter, with Dick Carew as guardian. The baby arrives, and though the four bachelors have quite a time in learning the wants of the infant, and their struggles in caring for it are humorously pathetic, the child thrives and soon twines itself about the heart-strings of Dick Carew, who loves it as his own son, while "The Trinity" forget their dignity to romp on all-fours with the spoiled baby. Young Richard grows into a fine, handsome, athletic boy, adored by his guardians, and is sent to college, where he wins the highest honors as a "good sport" and a football hero, making the winning touchdown for his college team. He then meets a fascinating dancer, known as "The Firefly," who, hearing the rumor that "The Imp" will come into a vast fortune when he is twenty-one, proceeds to fascinate him, and he, thinking her a good and misjudged woman, falls into the trap she had made for him and marries her. How his eyes are opened at the worthlessness of the woman, how she eventually throws him aside when she learns that he has no fortune (his expenses being paid out of the meagre pockets of his guardians), how he is regenerated and strengthened by his intense suffering, and how he finds a finer, nobler love when he is finally freed from "The Firefly," are all grippingly developed in this tense dramatic photoplay.

THE SPANISH JADE (Fiction—April 11).—Manuela, daughter of a water seller in a provincial Spanish town, is sold as a dancing girl by her father to a strolling musician. In the course of her wanderings she meets a young man calling himself Esteban Vincas, in reality Don Bartolome Ramonez de Alavia, only son of a Spanish Hidalgo, Don Luis, who lives in poverty in his home in Valladolid. To escape the grind of poverty Bartolome runs away and becomes a thief and vagabond. Meeting Manuela, he falls in love with her and runs away with her, after stabbing the musician.

Meantime, in England, Mr. Osmund Manvers has experienced an unhappy love affair, and to seek forgetfulness plans a horseback trip through Spain. He comes upon Manuela and Bartolome at a wayside inn. Struck by Manuela's beauty, he contributes a gold piece to the cup which she passes, and rides away—without seeing Bartolome. The latter, however, determines to follow him and use Manuela as a lure to rob him. The next day Manvers rides into Valladolid, followed by Bartolome and Manuela, but as the two follow in through the city gate they are met my Don Luis and his servant, Tormillo. Don Luis pleads with the boy to return to his home, but Bartolome refuses and Don Luis departs heartbroken. This is the first intimation Manuela has ever had that her lover is of noble family. In pity for Don Luis, she begs Bartolome to leave her and return to his father, threatening to leave him if he refuses. He answers this by threatening to kill her if she attempts to leave him, and, with Manuela waiting for him outside the gate, follows the Englishman into the city. While waiting Manuela is annoyed by a gang of Spanish vagabonds. Spurring in among the gang, Manvers rescues the girl and carries her away into the country toward Madrid.

Bartolome, returning, discovers Manuel's escape and pursues and overtakes them towards noon in the woods, where Manvers pauses for lunch. Manuela, although terrified, makes no sign of recognizing Bartolome, and Manvers, unable to snub him, invites him to share their lunch, immediately leaving the two together while he goes to take a swim in a nearby stream. As soon as they are alone Manuela asks Bartolome what he wants. He replies that he has come to kill her. In desperation, the girl reclines in Bartolome's arms, and, before he knows what she is doing, stabs him in the back, killing him instantly. Manuela drags the body out of sight and flies to Madrid on Bartolome's mule, leaving Manvers her sole possession of any value—a crucifix—which she places conspicuously on the loaf of bread forming a part of his lunch.

Manvers returns, finds the two gone, surmises a love affair, eats his lunch and goes peacefully to sleep, although slightly touched by the discovery of the crucifix. He is awakened by the sound of digging. Behind the thicket he discovers a Spanish priest making ready to bury Bartolome. The priest is one whom Manuela has met upon the road and to whom she confessed her crime. He tells Manvers what the girl told him and vainly endeavors to swerve Manvers in his determination to find her and prove his gratitude. As a last resort the priest misdirects Manvers, so that he returns to Valladolid, failing to find Manuela there. Meanwhile Manuela has found refuge with a friend in Madrid, a girl of the streets.

In Valladolid, Manvers engages the services of Gil Perez as courier and valet. During the evening the sentimental Englishman visits the shop of Sebastian, the goldsmith, and commissions him to encase the crucifix in plates of gold, engraving on the outside "M," for Manuela, and the date. It happens that Don Luis overhears the affair. Later in the day Gurdias Civil reports to Don Luis the murder of Bartolome, naming Manuela and stating that the accomplice was "an Englishman." Don Luis connects the affair in the goldsmith's with the murder and decides that Manvers is the English accomplice and determines to challenge him to a duel. Manvers leaves Valladolid with Gil Perez before the challenge can be delivered, and Don Luis pursues him, accompanied by a friend and his servant, Tormillo. He overtakes Manvers in the post tavern at Madrid and the challenge is delivered. Manvers tears it up, refusing to fight a duel with a man old enough to be his grandfather. At this Tormilla asks and receives permission to assassinate Manvers; follows him from the hotel, shoots at him without effect, and, on his return to the hotel, stabs Manvers in the arm, a blow that would have

The Motiograph Satisfies Critical Buyers

The vital parts of MOTIOGRAPH projectors are so staunchly, so sturdily built that trouble is prevented first instead of remedied later.

The 1915 late model MOTIOGRAPH rightfully boasts of round and hardened parts, durability and dependability and economical operation with rock steady pictures.

This is why the MOTIOGRAPH "Satisfies Critical Buyers"—it means an initial and permanent value of "Dollar for Dollar."

been fatal but for the interference of Gil Perez. In the confusion that follows Manvers is denounced to the police as the murderer of Bartolome and is obliged to leave the hotel in their company. He contrives to escape with the assistance of Gil Perez. Pursued by the mob, he rushes through the streets of Madrid and falls at length exhausted in front of the house where Manuela lives.

Gil Perez, with the girl's help, carries Manvers into the house, dresses his wound, and while he is unconscious tells Manuela that the only way to save his life is by sacrificing herself to Don Luis. She consents, Gil Perez returns to Don Luis and tells him that Manuela is ready to give her life for the Englishman. Don Luis consents and the meeting is arranged in a public park at midnight. Gil Perez conducts Manuela to the park (Manvers being still unconscious), but first, to prepare against treachery on the part of Tormillo, he buys a flask of poisoned wine. Manuela meets Don Luis, gives him the knife with which Bartolome was killed and offers herself to it. Don Luis hesitates, and eventually throws the knife away, telling her that he cannot touch her—she has redeemed herself. He walks away, leaving Tormillo frantic with indignation that the murder of his young master should not be avenged. Gil Perez offers Tormillo the flask of poisoned wine. Tormillo consents to drink only if Gil Perez will drink first. Gil Perez, realizing this is the only way he can save Manuela and the Englishman, drinks and hands the flask to Tormillo, who also drinks. In the meantime, Manvers comes out of his unconsciousness and finds himself in a strange room and runs through Madrid until he, too, finds himself in the park and catches sight of Manuela. As he runs to her, Tormillo springs from his seat, prepared to stab them both, but before he can reach them falls dead. As this happens Gil Perez dies without moving from his seat.

SNOBS (Lasky) April 22.—Henry Disney, a milkman, residing in a small city, is discovered by Phipps, a lawyer, to be the heir to the title and fortune of the Duke of Walshire. Phipps and his sister, Laura, being pressed for money and anxious to maintain their social position, conspire together to arrange a marriage between the sister and the milkman before he knows that he is the Duke. Phipps has Disney assaulted and arranges to be near in order to rescue him and take him to the Phipps house.

In the meantime, however, Disney has met Ethel Hamilton, one of the young social leaders of the town, and has fallen in love with her, although he doesn't dare to speak of his love on account of the great difference in their social positions. His love for Ethel, however, prevents him from falling a victim for the wiles of Laura, and he finally escapes from Phipp's house, where they are trying to keep him on the pretense that he is very ill. He then discovers that he is the Duke.

The efforts of the milkman to be a Duke and to win the girl he loves lead to many humorous complications, and, finally at a ball which the milkman gives in honor of Ethel, his conduct so displeases her that she refuses his love and tells him very plainly that the social snobs who have been fawning upon him on account of his title have been making a fool of him. The milkman then begins to see a great light, and, after resenting an insult to Ethel by one of the snobs, takes occasion to tell them what he thinks of them. The dance breaks up in confusion and the milkman, sore at heart, sees that he is being used by the snobs, while they are making fun of him behind his back. He renounces his wealth and title and goes back to his milk route, where Ethel finds him. He agrees to do this on condition that Ethel will act as his instructor and teach him how to be a Duke.

This she finally consents to do and he drives her home in the milk wagon, after an understanding between them which promises a happy ending to his love story.

THE UNAFRAID (Lasky—Four Parts—April 1).—In Montenegro two brothers, Stefan and Michael Balsic, are at enmity because of opposite political views. Stefan, the elder and the head of his ancient house, is a loyal and favorite subject of King Nikolas; Micheal is dissolute and conspires with the Dual Empire against his own country, hoping to gain position and wealth when the enemy takes possesion of the land. He is the instigator of a revolution, which is being financed by the Secret Agent of the Empire. The money which is given him for the purpose of starting this revolution, however, he squanders in Paris on wine and women. When he is called to account for this by the Secret Agent, who threatens to turn him over to the King of Montenegro for punishment, he pleads for just one week in which to make good the loss and start the revolt. At about this time Michael sees a newspaper picture of Delight Warren, a rich New York heiress, and schemes to marry her, using her money to reinstate himself and carry out his plans. He meets Delight, who is impressionable, and at once captivates her, so that she determines to marry him in spite of the opposition of her uncle and aunt and also in spite of the warning of Count Stefan, who calls upon her to try and make her see her mistake. When she tells Michael that Stefan has been to see her, Michael replies that it is true Stefan is his brother, but that his reputation is such his name is never mentioned in the family.

Delight goes to Montenegro, accompanied only by her racing chauffeur, Jack McCarty, who proves loyal when even her maid refuses to go. On the day of her arrival, Michael has been summoned to a Court function from which he does not dare to absent himself, and sends his secretary to meet Delight. On the way to the castle of her fiance she is kidnapped by Count Stefan, who explains that he must hold her a prisoner in order that she shall not put her wealth at the disposal of his treacherous brother. He says that the only honorable manner in which he can take her to his home is to marry her, and as there is no other way out of the difficulty, she finally consents to the ceremony. At his castle, Count Stefan treats her with the utmost civility and even with formality. She is not convinced of Michael's guilt, but is forced to believe in Stefan's sincerity, especially as he says that she need only remain in his own house until Michael is either convicted or cleared from his accusation, and that she can then return to America and have her marriage to him annulled. Michael, hearing of what has transpired, goes with McCarty to the American minister, and lodges a complaint against his brother. McCarty has already become suspicious of Michael and refuses to take any definite stand. The American minister decides to go and see for himself. Delight consents to dine with her husband and the minister, and during the dinner prevents Stefan from being poisoned by one of Michael's men. The minister decides that there is no reason for him to interfere.

Once again the Agent of the Dual Empire comes to remind Michael that his time to make his promises good has expired. This time he pleads for only a delay of one day, and within the space of that time succeeds in kidnapping Delight and taking her to his own castle. He also captures Danilo—Stefan's right-hand man—and threatens to put out the eyes of this man unless Delight pays him an enormous sum of money. Delight pays the money, but at this time Stefan and his men arrive. During the ensuing fight between the two brothers and their respective henchmen, Stefan finally blows in the doors of the castle. Michael finally kills himself rather than submit to capture and disgrace. Delight then confesses her love for Stefan.

MINA FILMS

THE success of an exhibitor rests principally upon a wise selection of pictures to make up his program. Everywhere one reel comedies are in popular favor. To profit by this condition dozens of companies began the production of such pictures, most of them of indifferent quality, and you were confused in your effort to select the wheat from the cockle.

MinA one reel comedies are wheat in the field of comic pictures—a staff of sustenance to the life of your business. They are wholesome in fun, sustaining in action and a treat to your patrons. Added to this the exquisiteness of clever acting, under capable direction, with careful attention to settings and photography, make MinA films a delight. Released every Thursday.

3 Large Mirroroide Screens Sold in One Hour

By Our Agent, Harry K. Lucas, Atlanta, Georgia

Pretty good record for the man and the screen.

There wouldn't be this demand if Mirroroide did not "have the goods."

Mirroroide, the One Screen

That can be used under all conditions. Indoors, outdoors, rain or shine, any climate. Wash it with soap and water, it will not crack, peel or turn black. It's guaranteed for 5 years—a bona fide guarantee.

Will your screen meet these tests?

Are you getting the very best results it's possible for you to get? Why is Mirroroide used by the U. S. Government at West Point, Madison Barracks, N. Y., and throughout the U. S. Navy?

Why did we sell and deliver 79 screens during March?

The answer is that Mirroroide is without question the finest projection surface known, no matter from what angle viewed. With Mirroroide your pictures will be clearer, brighter and flickerless. Remember, eye strain and haze are unknown with Mirroroide.

Let us send you large Free Samples and prove the above facts.

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

"TWO DE LUXE EDITIONS"

An Unsolicited Testimonial

A clothing manufacturer paid recently three thousand or more "iron men" for a page ad in the Saturday Evening Post. He ran two large illustrations showing Rex Beach and Harold MacGrath, and he named "The Adventures of Kathlyn" and "The Spoilers," two great successes filmed by the House of Selig. This manufacturer did not expend many thousands in cold cash for nothing. He knew, just as you know, Mr. Exhibitor, that Selig Spectacular Specials are household words. He merely cashed in on Selig popularity. He was wise to prevailing sentiment.

How to Make Money

by Lewis J. Selznick

No. 14

This series of articles is planned to make money for you—to show you why my ideas have succeeded—and why they will succeed for you if you will weigh each one carefully. Some of them will sound egotistical. I want them to—it's the only way I can drive home my arguments.

The man who is competing with himself has just as real a competitor as the man who competes with someone else.

The policy of cheap film means that he does not get all of the business that he can easily get with a different policy.

This is proven by the fact that as soon as a theatre changes from the cheap to the worth-while films its attendance immediately jumps enormously.

To prove this, there have been cases where we have sent out heralds and advertising matter to the best people in a given town, and they have taken the trouble to talk to the moving picture manager and ask him to run the features they have read about.

The Kingston Theatre at Kingston Avenue, Brooklyn, was sold recently, and the new manager installed feature films. The house had been running cheap programs and losing ground steadily. As a result of the new feature policy, the house is paying wonderfully well. Very seldom is it possible to get a seat after 8 o'clock without waiting.

A block away from this picture house is the Albany Theatre, which was run on the old policy of cheap films. The minute the new house began to advertise feature films, the little patronage that the other house had began to dwindle. It dwindled so much, that the owner sold the house. Henry Holtz and William Brandt, the new owners, were clever enough to run a feature program, and the result is that both theatres are playing to crowded houses and making money. There is a continuous stream from one theatre to the other of people who find it impossible to get a seat in one house and try the other. Both of these theatres run World Film.

The men who claim that they are getting all the business they can get find when they adopt the feature policy that they have never reached the limit of their drawing power before. Features not only bring the regulars, but also bring a class that never go to ordinary "picture shows"—but do turn out in droves to see big plays and big stars properly advertised.

All this will be done at a cost to the Exhibitor so absurdly low that the present prices Exhibitors are paying for so-called features will look like rank extravagance.

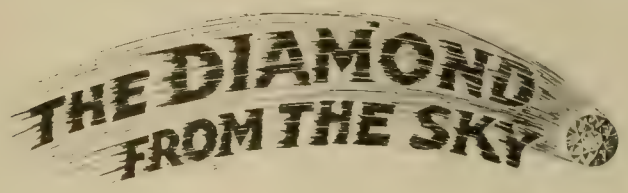
Now Ready For Exhibitors

THE first complete three chapters of "The Diamond From the Sky"—the $800,000.00 "Flying A" continued photoplay—are now ready for exhibitors at Every Mutual Exchange in America.

We are so confident of the success of this masterful production that we have arranged to show the first three complete chapters to exhibitors as an indication of the exceptional quality throughout. You can see—before you book this mammoth attraction—Lottie Pickford, Irving Cummings, William Russell, Charlotte Burton, George Periolat, Eugenie Forde, W. J. Tedmarsh and Orral Humphrey enact all the thrilling scenes for which you have waited.

You can see, with your own eyes, the opening of this story, with its romantic traditions. You can see the characters as infants, as children and as young folk. You can see charming Lottie Pickford in the role of the heroine—dashing Irving Cummings as the hero. You can see the thrilling automobile race in Chapter 3, in which your breath is taken away as a transcontinental express train almost dashes a racing car to pieces. You can see the same racing car dashed over a cliff—the most thrilling film conception ever reproduced. You can see——but why tell any more? Go see it—at any Mutual Exchange in America.

$10,000.00 for a Suggestion!



A Picturized Romantic Novel

First Release May 3rd

THE first release of "The Diamond From the Sky" will be May 3rd. The first chapter will be in three acts. Thereafter a two-act chapter will be released each week. The story will appear simultaneously with the film in 500 newspapers throughout the country.

Remember $10,000 was paid for this scenario, the best of 19,846 submitted. Another $10,000 is now offered for a sequel to this prize play. This offer is open to every man, woman and child. Exhibitors everywhere are pronouncing this the most phenomenal photoplay production ever presented.

At an exhibition recently held in Chicago, 400 exhibitors immediately endorsed the first three chapters unqualifiedly. Exhibitions are now being held throughout the country. Go see the films—decide for yourself. Ask the North American representative in any Mutual Exchange in America.

The secret of the constantly increasing demand for "HAM" Comedies, is contained in the letter we recently received from W. C. Harwood, of the Vermont Theatre, Toronto, Ont.

The Favorites—Mabel Trunnelle and Augustus Phillips

in the

TENSE 3-ACT FEATURE
"With Bridges Burned"

From the famous story by Rex Beach. Released in regular service, Friday, May 7th.—3000 feet.

A revival of the successful Edison film of the same name.

"With Bridges Burned" is a feature, full of the finest impulses and worthiest motives that can actuate a man. It thrills with the intensity of devoted man and wife, stricken in fortune, separated on their wedding day and doing deeds as desperate in self-denial as any physical daring. To see so fine—so worthy—a picture is to feel that the world is a better place than we thought.

Mabel Trunnelle plays again the same role of the little unselfish wife whose royal courage faces feats that man draws back from—plays it with that unfailing sympathetic appeal that her winsome personality always evokes.

While Augustus Phillips places upon the screen some of the finest work of his career in the devoted husband half crazed in his night-and-day race with time and against a powerful conspiracy of grafters.

Edison features embody all the entertainment, all the "punch" which plays of real power have—they typify to an extent well registered on the cash register that it pays to play "features of strength—not length"—Edison's Features in the REGULAR SERVICE.

Edison Slogan—"Strength, Not Length"

The Funniest, Snappiest, Animated Cartoons

Raoul Barré's cartoons are different from any other on the market. The clever idea of having the cartoons move while he is in the act of drawing them makes these cartoons even more funny if that is possible. Barré's humor is a blending of the dash of the American and is spiced with all the piquancy of the fun-loving French—and the result is the most laughable, the most genuinely refreshing screen humor that has yet been registered.

This distinguished cartoonist has played his part in French history by the clever and biting cartoons he made during the noted Dreyfus case in Paris.

These animated cartoons will appear exclusively in the Edison program. If you want the fun that is different—that is as welcome ever as sunshine after a fog of alleged "comedies"—hitch up to Barré and Edison.

Facts and Comments

THE trouble with many of the opponents of the motion picture is a lack of fairness joined to multitudinous misinformation. We are very happy to note that the film men on their part exhibit great forbearance and stick to the facts, carefully avoiding personalities. A good illustration of this creditable method of debate was seen recently in a Southern city, where the advocates of a Puritan Sabbath conducted a campaign against the opening of the motion picture houses on Sundays. The services of a traveling "evangelist" and "reformer" were secured to assist in the Sabbatarian crusade. This man viciously attacked the "National Board of Censors," characterizing its members as "friends of the film producers," and stigmatizing the board in its entirety as "a humbug." In response to this attack the leading exhibitor of the city took a page of advertising in the local newspapers and in a most temperate statement entirely confined to facts he shows the injustice of the "evangelist's" attack. In his reply to the "evangelist" the exhibitor says: "It is my belief that he was not thoroughly acquainted with the facts or conditions, and my sole object in presenting these facts to the people of this city is to acquaint them with the character of the people comprising the National Board of Censorship." It is difficult to resist the belief that our exhibitor will have the thinking people of the community with him.

A NEW experiment in titles which is one of the features in a serial story about to be released by one of the pioneer producers will be watched with a good deal of interest. The pictures in question carry the titles in the various scenes themselves. By most people the innovation will probably be considered in the nature of an improvement. The title too often breaks the continuity of thought in the spectator and except in cases where a title is indispensable it often jars upon the mind. To make the title part of the scene itself is far less likely to disturb the spectator's interest than the present prevalent method of inserting titles between the scenes. The experiment will be watched with a good deal of interest and may, if successful, lead to a revolution in titling.

WE have mailed to the readers of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD an eight-page folder, which deals with the whole censorship question in all its aspects. It contains not only a summary of all the arguments against legalized censorship, but it touches also upon the historic and humorous sides of the question. It likewise contains a brief review of censorship as it has worked out in Ohio and Pennsylvania. We have placed the booklets in the hands of the readers of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD as a reference book or a sort of miniature encyclopedia on the whole subject of censorship. Our aim has been to render a service to the industry, and we hope that our readers will find the folder useful in more than one way. The folder as a whole is suitable for general distribution to your audience. If you want to issue only part of the material assembled in the folder it will be easy to do that and distribute it to your audience. If any of our subscribers have been overlooked in our mailing of this pamphlet we hope to hear from them at once and the folder will be mailed to them immediately. We will also send additional copies of one or two hundred folders to any exhibitor who will assure us that he can use them to good advantage and that he is willing to pay for the cost of mailing them.

A FRIEND and subscriber located in a Western State writes to call our attention to the "seemingly forgotten poster." The poster is not forgotten, not even seemingly. Our friend asks why the lithographers "seize the most excitable and sensational point in every production." He wants "more restful and soothing posters." We quite agree with him, but we know that there is a large number of film men to whom "the paper" is what the fetich is to an African savage. He just worships "strong paper." No doubt there has been an improvement in this respect. Time was when many exhibitors merely demanded to see "the flash" and cared next to nothing about the picture. We have evolved from this stage which, nobody objecting, we will call the cave period of filmdom. At the same time the number of "unevolved" exhibitors is alarmingly large.

Our Aching Void

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

BETWEEN a poor drama and a fine one," says Henry James, "there is a wider interval than anywhere else in the scale of success. The fine thing in a real drama, generally speaking, is that more than any other work of literary art, it needs a masterly structure."

Just how far the critical essay of Mr. James applies to the visualization of a story depends very largely on the length of that story. If it be shown in five or more reels, even in three reels, there is a wide variety of structural method, from which an author may select according to his taste and to the requirements of his theme, but structure is a matter of logical necessity just where it is least found, in the one-reel products and those of two reels. This is because they are usually the work of amateurs. Amateurs in the matter of logical structure write nearly all the scenarios for small photoplays. The work is confined to them because the price offered is far below what a professional author receives from other sources for the same time, labor and artistic training involved.

Why senarios that are wholly lacking in pre-established design, which have to be made over by directors who could not earn carfare as authors in the open market, are visualized at all, is due to a lack of understanding on the part of producers that no successful structure is made in other lines except from a pre-established design. When a director who knows his business gets a scenario from an author who knows his business, few changes of structure are made and these invariably before the work of visualization begins. Even in the matter of treatment, the director's legitimate field, the author's suggestions are closely followed, or, at least, given due consideration.

This does not mean that scenarios by capable authors can not be improved. To the contrary, they are often changed to the advantage of the completed result, and these changes are almost as often suggested by men not especially qualified as either authors or directors. It must be remembered also that I am not referring to all authors, but only to those who thoroughly understand shaping the materials of fiction so as to perfectly suit screen requirements. The strict limitations of the one-reel and the two-reel photoplays raise the question of structure to a high place, yet these are the very ones professional authors will seldom write, because of equally strict limitations in the compensation offered by producers. A hundred dollars a reel is the minimum likely to attract professional talent to the creation of worth-while screen stories of the shorter kind.

The so-called "features" present constructive difficulties in proportion to their size. More than the full-sized stage play, they need to be "shaped, fashioned and laid together," and this, according to Mr. James, "makes a demand upon an artist's rarest gifts. He must combine and arrange, interpolate and eliminate. It is a problem in ingenuity, and a problem of the most interesting kind." Much that Mr. James has to say of the stage play applies to that of the screen, though the methods of construction are in many respects so wide apart as to bear no resemblance to each other. He merely emphasizes the necessity of fine structural design before the work of production is attempted.

Only in a series of articles on the subject could any attempt to differentiate methods of construction be made, but it may be of service to point out some common weaknesses that are destroying interest in screen productions. One of these is the arbitrary determination of events, forcing the issue, and another is that mindless method well denominated "the easiest way."

If we were only dealing with immature minds, almost any tale of the impossible and improbable would do, but moving picture fans are constantly gaining in wisdom, and they exact that people in the screen story shall obey the laws of their being, that they shall do as they would off the screen in similar circumstances. The screen detective puts on a mustache and, presto, he can not be recognized by his nearest friends. He leaves his office to find a clue to the crime and literally stumbles over it, though it escapes the observation of every one else. The girl detective walks straight to where the real criminal is hiding and gets the evidence without an effort, though her general inanity of appearance and conduct would lead one to believe that she could not detect a pan of burning biscuits.

Weighted down as we are with a code of laws ill-suited to our social growth, disgusted as we often are with their inequitable enforcement, we are accomplishing nothing toward the betterment of conditions by picturing stories in which the hero is sentenced to ten years in prison on evidence no sane judge would consider adequate. The planting of a stolen article in the pocket of the innocent hero, his proximity to the scene of a crime, the discovery of his weapon or other possession of his near a victim, and all such arbitrary methods carry no weight with an audience. The absence of motive, cleanliness of past conduct, and the thousand and one signs of innocence are given no consideration. He is arbitrarily sent to jail for a term and escapes by methods obviously impossible.

There are minor faults of structure, common enough because they emanate from the shallow minds of writers who underestimate the intelligence of people who go to the picture show. What a sense of emptiness one feels when, as occasionally happens, there is woven a really clever complication, one which arouses anticipation of an equally clever solution, and the author, as though unable to extricate himself, cuts the gordian knot with a slash of commonplace. The author's intervention with an obtrusion of the arbitrary is amateurish in the extreme. The plot should obey its own logic, follow a well-defined sequence of causation to an ultimate result that is satisfying. The objective point of a complex plot is a denouement worth waiting for and in accord with the importance of preceding events.

Our aching void in the matter of satisfactory plays is not to be supplied by writers incapable of applying to their work an attention of thought that embodies idealism in conception, artistry in selection, and science in construction.

Consider, in selecting from a mass of scripts: (1) Has the author a story to tell or is he merely repeating what has been done? (2) Is there a worth-while idea involved? (3) Is there an artistic possibility in the development? (4) Is it planned with that skill which at once denotes ability? (5) Does the story conform to high standards? (6) Is it, as a whole, worth the expenditure of a large amount of money for production? Having settled these points in its favor, the scenario may be turned over to the director and it should prove an inspiration to him in deciding upon the physical aspects to be presented.

Balancing the Program

By W. Stephen Bush.

BALANCING the program is a science. It is also a real test of the ability of the exhibitor. Show me a successful exhibitor and I will show you a well-balanced program. It makes no difference whether you run a five-cent house or whether you have an automobile contingent among your patrons, your success will very largely depend on the way you compile your program. Balancing a daily program is about the hardest task I can imagine from the exhibitor's point of view. The man who strikes a good average in balancing a daily program is a rare combination of a juggler, an acrobat and a lightning calculator.

The exhibitor who changes once or twice a week has a far better field for demonstrating his ability to please and hold his public. A well-balanced program running for three days or for a week in succession will not only maintain its strength, but will more often than not increase it as the performances pass by. There was a time when exhibitors used to think a program well-balanced if it had a "drama" and a "comedy." If a so-called scenic or "educational" was added the balancing was considered little short of phenomenal. In these days booking a film in the exchange was an extra-hazardous risk and two heavy dramas or two farce comedies on one program were altogether too frequent. Even today this sort of ill-balanced program crops up every once in a while, though today there is no excuse at all for the exhibitor who is guilty of this sort of thing. Many of us remember the day when the operator was the supreme arbiter of the show. His only instructions would be to get a good "Western" and a "comedy" to send them "home laughing." Between the operator and the booking clerk some terrible shows were "selected" and hurled at a defenseless public.

Today the exhibitor, if he wants to stay in business, must do his own thinking. The most successful exhibitor is he who selects a program which is as far as possible good in all its parts. If any part of the program is so much better than the rest and overshadows everything else the program is not strong as a whole. A reckless mixture of "fillers" and "features" can never make a good program. Of course it is impossible to lay down any hard and fast rules for balancing a program. The hardest thing in the world is to analyze a well-balanced program. The public can tell a well-balanced program in a moment. They like it, but they would be puzzled to give their reasons. In a general way one might say that there must be a keyhole in the program, which both creates and dominates atmosphere of the show. The relations between the various parts of the program must have a certain harmony. To produce this harmony means to balance your program properly and cleverly. There are programs in which one part laughs and almost sneers at the other. If in one number you strike a deeply tragic note you cannot in another part show a boisterous farce comedy. The contrast would be too violent and the sense of proportion which is present in all of us receives too much of a shock. Recently I saw two pictures, one a very famous or rather well-advertised production and the other the ambitious effort of a young director. In both pictures the celebrated thin line which divides the sublime from the ridiculous was constantly crossed and re-crossed, partly to the annoyance and partly to the amusement of the audience. A program with such absurd fluctuations is just as bad as a picture that lacks congruity.

There is such a thing as "matching" your program. It is an art which cannot be learned over night. It means natural taste and ability in the first place and a lot of experience in the second place.

There are certain kinds of films available today which make the compilation of a program much easier than it ever was before. I repeat that I am speaking of the weekly and semi-weekly rather than the daily program. I have in mind as splendid aids toward balancing a program the cartoons in films, the topical reviews or animated weeklies and the colored picture. There is a splendid future for films in cartoons. I judge of this by the obvious delight with which a good moving picture cartoon is received by the audiences of the first-class theaters. There is a comic cartoon, or rather trick picture, a revival and an improvement of the old-time trick pictures which seem to make a great hit with motion picture audiences. These pictures are never very long, a couple of hundred feet is a maximum of length, but cleverly done they have an undoubted place on the screen and add an invaluable zest of variety to every program.

The interest excited by good topical reviews can scarcely be exaggerated. If the attitude of the audiences I have watched may serve as a criterion no part of a motion picture program is more popular than a good topical review. Of this feature of kinematographic service the same holds true as of cartoons and cartoon-like comic trick pictures; the best is yet to come. We think great progress has been made in the filming of contemporaneous history, but we are frank to say that much more can be done and, we have no doubt, will be done. The pictorial news service is really just coming into its own. The day will come when the entire globe will be encircled with stations of camera men ready to do their reporting at a moment's notice. The essence of the film news service is promptness. Today most of our screen news is the result of a carefully arranged schedule. The editor keeps an assignment book in which the events of the immediate and sometimes of the remote future are carefully set down and whenever the event takes place the camera man is on hand. Very frequently the events are arranged to meet the needs of the camera man. Every courtesy and facility are extended to him and every great personage on the ground "reluctantly" gets as close to the camera as possible. There is another department of reporting. I am speaking of the great events which are not scheduled, which happen at the most unexpected times and at the most unexpected places. To film such events is the premier task of the topical review of the future. Something has been accomplished along these lines even today, but much more may be expected hereafter. The colored picture we regret to say is not as plentiful as it was some years ago, when Pathe and Gaumont often made the story on the screen seem like a succession of animated paintings. The charm and appeal of color is elementary and eternal. "Kinemacolor," so-called, has not been either a commercial or a photographic success, but the beauty of the hand-colored film endures to this day and will never want its enthusiastic admirers. The wonderful invention the results of which were displayed in the Hippodrome at Paris and at exhibitions here in New York, seems to have been halted by the war—at least nothing has been heard of lately. At any rate the supply of colored pictures is by no means small and a little effort will bring them to any exhibitor who realizes the potency of color.

Support the World's Plan

The Idea of Writing the Freedom of the Screen Into the Organic Law of the State Calls Forth Words of Enthusiastic Approval.

THE plan of THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD to guard the motion picture interests in this state against any further attempts to establish legalized censorship has met with the most enthusiastic approval and support of all the big men in the various branches of our great industry. The plan advocated by THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD consists of an amendment to the constitution, placing the motion picture on a plane of absolute equality with the press. The constitutional convention called to meet in this state to consider changes in the fundamental law will reassemble at Albany on the 26th day of this month and will then, with short interruptions, be in session until probably September.

The change advocated by THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD was fully outlined in our last issue. The article relating to the freedom of the press is to be enlarged by adding the motion picture and bestowing upon the latter the same privileges and immunities which are now enjoyed by the press. A prominent member of the convention will stand sponsor for this proposed amendment granting freedom to the motion picture. If the proposed amendment is approved by a majority of the delegates the people will vote upon it in November. If the vote favors the amendment, censorship in this state will receive a death blow. It will mean peace and security for the motion picture for at least another generation.

The moral effect of such an amendment, it is needless to say, would be felt far beyond the boundaries of the state of New York.

J. Stuart Blackton of the Vitagraph Company was one of the first men in the industry who was interviewed on the subject by a representative of The Moving Picture World. He endorsed the plan of The World without qualification and in terms of enthusiasm.

"You may say," he told The World man, "that I and the firm are absolutely opposed to the stand taken by the Hotel Astor meeting, and if I had been there I would have made our stand known in plain terms. We are against censorship of any and all kinds. We are opposed to Federal censorship, opposed to state censorship and opposed to municipal censorship. In fact we condemn all forms of legalized censorship. Your plan of writing a prohibition of censorship into the organic law of the state is a most excellent one and I am sure it will have the ardent support of all responsible film men. Speaking for the Vitagraph Company I wish to say that we will be at the convention if necessary either personally or we will have our attorney appear there. You may quote me on that score unreservedly.

"I want to say a good word for our voluntary board of censors, the present National Board of Censorship. I think they have done splendid work and I think this fact is recognized by all the producers. We for one co-operate with them most cheerfully. We seek to adhere to the standards and rules they have laid down, and if all the producers meet them in the same way legalized censorship ought to die a natural death. I think the opposition to the motion picture is growing weaker any way. A few years ago clerical agitators were listened to with attention; today they are no longer listened to. The public is capable of forming its own conclusions and judging of the pictures. Your way of stopping censorship here, if successful, would be the most effective beyond all doubt and the Vitagraph Company wishes The Moving Picture World success in its splendid undertaking."

Ingvald C. Oes, the American representative of the Great Northern Film Company, is known as one of the pioneers of the film world. Amid many changes in the various branches of the industry Mr. Oes and the company he has represented so ably have always stood for the same principles, chief of which are clean pictures and a square deal to exchangeman and exhibitor. When seen by a representative of The Moving Picture World Mr. Oes spoke in strong support of the proposed amendment to the constitution.

"There may be certain evils incident to the production of motion pictures," said Mr. Oes, who, by the way, has given the question of censorship a good deal of serious consideration, "but censorship is not the best way of dealing with them. After all the whole thing resolves itself to this: Which is the lesser evil? Shall we treat the motion picture like the press, giving the producers the same freedom which is enjoyed by the publishers, or shall we put the burden of censorship on the pictures. I think that the present laws against the showing of bad pictures are sufficient to deal with all objectionable films. If all producers were thoroughly responsible and responsive to sound public opinion there would of course be no need of any regulation whatever, but as such a state of affairs seems impossible in practice the present law must be enforced strictly.

"I think the National Board which the Great Northern has supported from the first is a good and fair tribunal to judge pictures. There is one thing I want to mention in particular. The press certainly has abused its freedom by exploiting murder cases and ultra-sensational matters generally. I would not like to see the screen debased in the same way.

"If the pictures are to enjoy more freedom hereafter I hope that some means will be found to stop the portrayal of contemporaneous crime on the films. Let the yellow press do that. The pictures are here for something better. I hope that when your amendment is proposed you will pay attention to this particular feature of the situation. We want no murder cases on the films and no salacious or scandalous news on the screen."

Harry R. Raver, another well-known pioneer in filmdom, who has brought some of the choicest European products to this country and whose crowning glory was the triumph of "Cabiria," le dernier cri in the art of filming, expressed himself in hearty accord with The Moving Picture World in its endeavor to enfranchise pictures.

"I think this is by all means the most effective way of fighting the common enemy, i. e., legalized censorship. I see that if your plan can be carried out it will mean the end of censorship in this state for two or three decades at least. No one knows more about the vagaries of censorship and its injustice than I do. Let me correct the impression that the theatrical managers association is indifferent as to censorship. It certainly is not. It is everlastingly opposed to it and you cannot make this too strong. They realize that in this matter, at least, their interests are bound up with those of the film men. If censorship of motion pictures spreads; if the politicians begin to taste graft, it will not be long before a censorship of the drama will be proposed. The damage done by the censorship of the drama in England alone would be hard to calculate. We don't want anything like it here in this country. The need of the hour is harmony in all quarters which are threatened by the censorship mania. You may quote me as enthusiastically in favor of your proposition. We will all get behind it."

Horace G. Plimpton, the dominant spirit in the Edison studio in Fordham, though immersed and indeed almost submerged by important business, gladly spared the time to assure The World man of his hearty endorsement of the plan to secure constitutional freedom for the motion picture. He spoke words of praise for the National Board which he thought would always remain a factor in the situation.

"But," he continued, "if you can make the plan of The Moving Picture World go through, that, of course, would be the best of all. You certainly have my best wishes, and even if the plan does not bear immediate fruit the agitation will not have been in vain. I think you will in this way be able to arouse the interest of the average man, and that, it seems to me, is a pretty nard thing to do. The average man really cares little about the subject one way or the other, but of course he can be aroused and educated, and that, it seems to me, will surely be accomplished by an agitation for a constitutional enfranchisement of the motion picture. Mayor Gaynor had the right idea on the subject.

"Of course, personally, I am opposed to all kinds of censorship of the legalized variety. Once started the trail of censorship would soon run across the entire continent. Federal censorship would alternate with state censorship, then there would be municipal censorship and we possibly might end up with censorship for the county of the Bronx and the township of Montclair. That's where I live you know. Censorship is ruinous because ideal broad-minded censors can never be guaranteed, indeed as a rule the censors have narrow views. I certainly am with The Moving Picture World in this plan to write the freedom of the motion picture into the organic law of the state. We will stand behind you in your endeavors and support you to the best of our ability."

Scope of the "V-L-S-E."

Albert E. Smith and Other Officers of the New Combination Are Certain it Will Meet Needs of the Exhibitor.

INCREASED production is the keynote of the policy at the Vitagraph studio, according to Albert E. Smith, president of the Vitagraph-Lubin-Selig-Essanay Motion Picture Company, incorporated in Albany, N. Y., on April 5 for $500,000 and now in operation. Mr. Smith recently said that, in addition to the Blue Ribbon Features to be handled through the new combine, the present plans call for a second weekly feature to be released on the regular General Film program, beginning in September.

The "V-L-S-E," as regarded by its president, is destined to fill a need in the distribution of multiple-reel pictures that never could be met by the General Film, constituted in all of its exchange mechanism for the handling of a regular program. "Experience seems to show," he said, "that in selecting features, exhibitors do not take kindly to the system that does very well for the circulation of short subjects. The 'V-L-S-E,' with some twenty branches scattered throughout the country and chains of secondary offices allied with the main centers of distribution, should give just the outlet all of us have wanted for some time. The new combination is in no way a criticism of the General Film; rather it is a modern means of meeting modern film conditions. Each of the four producers concerned will release one picture a month until September, when the output will be doubled. The branch offices should not be confused with exchanges, for this is in no way an exchange proposition and exhibitors will not be hampered by exacting contracts."

Col. W. N. Selig.

Siegmund Lubin.

Speaking of the place that Vitagraph films may be expected to occupy in the feature market, Mr. Smith said that for the first time in the history of the company, stage stars and stage plays will figure prominently in the productions. "There is no question about the present demand for picturizations of plays and screen appearances of celebrated actors, and up to date it has not been adequately met, because most of the feature producers have lacked the experience needed to make a satisfying photoplay adaptation. Anybody can take a stage success, work it over into some sort of scenario and employ a star; but there is no guarantee that the result will at all approximate the original. We have had sixteen years' experience in telling stories on the screen and with all due modesty, I think we know how it should be done, better, perhaps, than men who are new at the game."

Mr. Smith places considerable reliance on the judgment of his scenario editors in selecting plays with screen possibilities, in contrast to those almost entirely dependent upon dialogue, and he is certain of the ability of his directors when it comes to the details of the actual production. Most of the films will run five or six reels. As for the facilities at the Vitagraph plant, they are ample for all of the projects now underway.

Despite his interest in the present movement, Mr. Smith has not changed his opinion about the permanent demand for one and two reel subjects as the rock foundation of the industry. In support of his belief he points to the European market where the pendulum has swung from short to long photoplays and back again to the brief stories. He believes, however, that in this country there is plenty of room for both and the aim of the Vitagraph will be to produce the best in short as well as extended photoplays.

The position of Siegmund Lubin, vice-president of the "V-L-S-E," is explained in this fashion by General Manager Ira M. Lowry: "We are pledged to produce the highest quality of feature film and these features, which will run from four thousand feet upwards will surpass anything that has been made in the past. For some time we have been studying the demands of the public and we have arranged our plans accordingly. It is impossible to place too much emphasis on the type of production we intend to release. Neither time nor money will be spared in making each picture a masterpiece and it will be possible for the exhibitor to obtain these at moderate prices. Already offices have been opened in New York, Chicago, Kansas City, Salt Lake City, Portland, San Francisco, Los Angeles, Dallas, Atlanta, Boston, Philadelphia, Columbus and other cities. More will follow that we may be in direct touch with all exhibitors.

George K. Spoor.

"We have an imposing array of features on our shelves at the present time whereas important productions now in the making, or soon to be produced are 'The Light Eternal,' by M. V. Merle; 'Mrs. Dane's Defense,' by Henry Arthur Jones; 'The Great Divide,' by William Vaughn Moody; 'The Woman in the Case,' 'The Truth' and 'Captain Jinks,' by Clyde Fitch. In every picture a prominent star will be featured and supported by the strongest cast obtainable."

William N. Selig, treasurer of the new concern, said when interviewed a few days ago: "The question of proper distributing channels for the more elaborate motion picture plays has been puzzling manufacturers for some time. We believe it has been satisfactorily settled for all concerned and especially for the exhibitor, who now will be permitted to select his own feature program direct. For many months the Selig Company has been engaged in the production of 'Spectacular Specials,' a name we have coined for photoplays of five or more reels. Strong stories, convincing acting, clear photography and correct scenic backgrounds are essentials in any pretentious picture and we believe that our forthcoming releases contain all of these qualifications.

"Harold MacGrath's novel, 'The Carpet From Bagdad,' selected for our first release, is to my mind an unusually beautiful photoplay. It contains the atmosphere of the Orient, an exceptional plot and the sandstorm in the desert, I think, will be found to be very realistic. I also look for great things from Edward E. Rose's drama, 'The Rosary,' which should prove appealing as well as entertaining. Kathlyn Williams and other well known players of our western stock companies appear in both of these productions. Then in due time we will issue Anna Katherine Green's 'The Millionaire Baby,' Charles Hoyt's 'A Texas Steer,' Rex Beach's 'The Ne'er-Do-Well' and other subjects of an equally interesting character."

Essanay is represented among the officers of the "V-L-S-E" by George K. Spoor, who was elected secretary. To start the ball rolling, the Essanay Company has three excellent productions ready for exhibitors—George Ade's "The Slim Princess," with Francis X. Bushman and Ruth Stonehouse in the principal parts; "Graustark," by George Barr McCutcheon, in which Mr. Bushman and Beverly Bayne are featured, and "The Crimson Wing," in six reels, featuring E. H. Calvert, Miss Bayne and Ruth Stonehouse.

The policy of adapting stage successes and popular novels will be followed in coming productions, which include Viola Allen in "The White Sister;" Raymond Hitchcock's starring vehicle, "The Yankee Consul;" "The Prince of Graustark," from McCutcheon's novel, "A Bunch of Keys;" Charles Hoyt's "A Tin Soldier;" "The Aviator," by James Montgomery; "The Lost Paradise," by Arnold Kummer, and Robert Hilliard's "Lost Twenty-four Hours."

Rush of Business to the V-L-S-E

Manager Walter W. Irwin Says That Exhibitors Have Welcomed the Big Combination With Open Arms.

THERE is keen rivalry among exhibitors to book the V-L-S-E (otherwise known as the "big four," Vitagraph-Lubin-Selig-Essanay) features. The task of pleasing all the applicants is one of the most difficult that the management has to solve. From the first mention of the intention of the four pioneer companies to deal directly with the exhibitor in booking their big productions, enquiries began to come in and before even the lay out of the executive offices had been planned exhibitors started a siege of the seventh floor of the Mecca building. During the past week individual exhibitors and representatives of big theatrical chains were seen mixed in a mass of half completed partitions, piled up office furniture, carpenters, plasterers, painters and numerous other mechanics, all unmindful of the noise, and all intent on getting an interview with General Manager Irwin or of New York Manager Partridge. Yet there was no confusion in spite of the unfinished condition of the office facilities. Booking on the two features already released ("The Eagle's Nest" a Lubin offering, and "The Juggernaut" presented by the Vitagraph Company), were filled with a promptness and accuracy that spoke well for the experience and organizing ability of the men at the head of the new company.

General Manager Walter W. Irwin in an interview to the World representative, said, "As we anticipated, exhibitors have welcomed with wide open arms the opportunity to book great, big, powerful picture plays direct from the manufacturer without any strings attached to the contract and plus the assurance of quality that is an inseparable part of the productions of the four pioneer companies, and at prices that are reasonable."

"The direct to the exhibitor policy does away with the middle man's profit and allows of better picture productions at reasonable rental charges. It puts the manufacturers and exhibitor in closer communication and the best interests of both are served by the intimacy.

"In producing big subjects, featuring the greatest players of both the speaking stage and the screen, the V-L-S-E Companies have spared no expense and that these master pictures might be offered to exhibitors within reason, without incurring a loss to the producers that the Vitagraph-Lubin-Selig-Essanay has brought into being.

"With sixteen productions, each featuring world famous players, all completed and release dates set, we are right now three months in advance of the current exhibitions and the exhibitor may book as many of these features as he chooses without tying himself, hand and foot, in contracts for other features that he does not want."

There is no Toronto office as stated last week. It should have been Atlanta, with W. C. Brandon as manager.

CHAS. J. GIEGERICH, PRESS REPRESENTATIVE OF V-L-S-E.

"The Big Four" (Vitagraph-Lubin-Selig-Essanay) has appointed Charles J. Giegerich its press representative. Mr. Giegerich has been a moving picture editor, has steered publicity for some of the biggest and brightest stars in the film firmament and has recently conducted the nation wide publicity campaign for Sir Douglas Mawson and his Antarctic motion pictures. This publicity matter was particularly fortunate and attracted very favorable attention. Mr. Giegerich is also a member of the Screen Club.

Lasky Announces Important Releases

THE Jesse L. Lasky Picture Play Company has definitely decided to release through the Paramount Program seven exceptional productions during the summer months of June, July and August. The seven productions thus about to be released are as follows:

Laura Hope Crews.

Laura Hope Crews, who has been engaged by the Lasky Company and David Belasco in association, through an arrangement with Morris Gest, in the film version of Wm. J. Hurlbut's epoch-making American domestic drama "The Fighting Hope"; Ina Claire in an especially merry comedy of youthful romance by Wm. C. De Mille, entitled "The Wild Goose Chase"; Edgar Selwyn, one of America's foremost stars and playwrights in a picturization of his own stupendous dramatic success, "The Arab"; Blanche Sweet, the international permanent star of the Lasky Company, in a photo-drama founded on "The Secret Orchard" adapted by Channing Pollock from the novel by Agnes and Egerton Castle; Blanche Sweet in a picture version of the new play by Margaret Turnbull entitled "The Clue"; Charlotte Walker in a photo-drama rendition of Chas. Kenyon's extraordinary American drama, "Kindling," presented by arrangement with Edward J. Bowes; and Fannie Ward in a picturization of her greatest international success, "The Marriage of Kitty," which was originally written in French by Fred de Gresac as "La Passerelle" and adapted into English by Cosmos Gordon Lennox.

By analyzing this list it will be seen that the stars in five out of seven productions are absolute new-comers to the screen, representing the most important artists who have been the most difficult to persuade to enter the field of photo-dramatic work. These five are Laura Hope Crews, Edgar Selwyn, Charlotte Walker, Fannie Ward and Ina Claire.

BLAND RETURNS TO ENGLAND.

R. Henderson Bland, a prominent English actor and poet, who first introduced himself to American audiences in the leading character of Kalem's Holy Land picture "From the Manger to the Cross," left New York Saturday, April 17, for England, after a successful season with Kitty McKay Company. Mr. Bland, about three months ago, offered his services to the British Government, and he will try for a commission on his arrival in London. Mr. Bland has two younger brothers who are serving in France at the present time.

BUNNY SERIOUSLY ILL.

John Bunny, favorite of many thousands of motion picture "fans," is seriously ill at his home in Flatbush, Brooklyn, N. Y. Bunny has a complication of physical troubles, but is making a brave fight, with chance of recovery. If the wishes of his numerous friends may count for anything in this crisis Bunny should rapidly regain his old time health and vigor.

A Los Angeles Exhibitor

Blaisdell Discovers Picture Presentation DeLuxe at Clune's Auditorium—Manager Brown a Man of Classic Ideas.

By the Moving Picture World Staff Correspondent.

Los Angeles, California.

THERE'S an exhibitor-showman or a showman-exhibitor out here in this southern California city who complains that his greatest difficulty is obtaining big motion pictures. The man who gives utterance to this somewhat remarkable declaration is Lloyd Brown, manager of W. H. Clune's big Auditorium, where for nine consecutive weeks the Griffith production of "The Birth of a Nation" has been holding the screen—and twice a day filling the 3,000-seat theater. Mr. Brown bluntly expresses the opinion that the exhibition of pictures is a showman's job, and adds that the proper presentation of a big subject should increase by at least 50 per cent. the entertainment quality of the producer's finished work. Mr. Brown wants more pictures like "The Birth of a Nation" and "Les Miserables." With "The Spoilers" he did much, and he expects to do much with the Kessel & Baumann production of George Beban in "The Sign of the Rose," made under the direction of Tom Ince.

W. H. Clune.

"The exhibition of motion pictures has been up to the present time what I would call a purely commercial business," said Mr. Brown in his office, the other day. "We have not been putting on the pictures from the showman's standpoint, but from the theatrical side. At first we had short subjects and then those of one and two reels. The first big theatrical subject was 'Les Miserables,' to my mind the greatest that has been made. The length of the Pathe picture was about the same as 'The Birth of a Nation,' 13,500 feet. Where the former was what I would call a slow picture—I am speaking of the action and consequently of the projection—the latter is a fast one."

Mr. Brown's treatment of "The Clansman"—as it is known here and not as "The Birth of a Nation"—is impressive. In the opening the curtain rises on a Southern home, of two stories, the front adorned with six pillars. The stage of the Auditorium is 100 feet wide and 55 feet deep. The opening is 50 feet. The mansion, which is 68 feet wide or long, if you prefer, sits back 20 feet from the stage opening. As the house appears to view the orchestra softly plays "The Mocking Bird." A woman garbed as Mrs. Cameron emerges from the front door and sits down to the side. A man dressed as Mr. Cameron comes out, caresses the hand of the woman, and slips into a chair by the entrance. The orchestra shifts to "Suwanee River." The stage lamps are lowered. A light appears in an upper window. The music changes to "Old Kentucky Home." The screen is lowered. The house is in the atmosphere of the story before the title is shown.

The music is one of the features of "The Clansman." There are over a hundred pieces in the score. With the six or seven repetitions as motifs or theme music there are 118 arrangements. "We have gone further with this production than we have with others because we had the opportunity," said Mr. Brown. "With others we could not get the subject in advance of the initial presentation. It takes a long time to make things perfect. As big scenes were being taken for the picture Mr. Clune and I would go out and watch them. At the same time we figured on the music that would fit the particular scene. When it came time to collect music for the orchestral arrangement we went after it in New York and San Francisco as well as here. There were a lot of back numbers we could not get. Old orchestra leaders could not help me—the stuff was simply out of print.

Lloyd Brown.

"I have been a theatrical man all my life—and I have been in the picture end off and on since 1898. In my time I have had much to do with music. Downstairs below the theater we have a projection room. We used to go down there for two or three hours in the morning and for the same time in the afternoon, the orchestra leader, the arranger and myself. In the cases of sixteen pieces of music I had to whistle them to the arranger, just dig them out of the back of my head.

"My idea of a musical accompaniment to a picture is to employ a medium that will heighten the dramatic effect, to work on the emotions. If you have a dramatic climax in your subject get every ounce of force out of it. In 'The Clansman' the music is pushing the picture. There are twenty-six pieces in the orchestra and also a big pipe organ. You will have noted that at times the music becomes riotous, but there is a reason for it."

The writer suggested that in his opinion nothing he had even seen quite approached "Les Miserables" in its appeal to the emotions.

The manager's eyes sparkled. "I am with you on that," he said, quickly. "While in 'Les Miserables' there are few if any of what are described as great scenes, I believe nothing has been done in pictures in the way of true acting like 'Les Miserables.'"

Mr. Brown told how in San Diego he put on the French dramatic subject. William W. Hodkinson, who was just starting his Progressive service, had the California rights. In San Diego the maximum admission ever charged for a picture entertainment was 10 cents. No subject had been shown for more than one day. When Mr. Brown finally secured the Pathe film he had only two or three days to prepare for its exhibition. He arranged his music, secured an orchestra of ten pieces and established his prices of admission at 25 and 50 cents. On his opening day his orchestra quit, demanding a half hour's rest. Impressing on his musicians the fact that if he used music at all he must use it continuously, and that a half hour's stop was impossible, the manager cajoled and pleaded for the entire week that the picture was shown. He won his point throughout the seven days and the theater was packed.

Then followed two five and six reel subjects, large ones, but not in the same category of the Pathe picture. "Les Miserables" was brought back for another week and again the house was crowded. "I gave up the theater because we could not get the plays we wanted," said Mr. Brown. "We had demonstrated we could do business, but the producers were not getting the right plays." It was in April a year ago Mr. Brown received a telegram from Mr. Clune that he had taken the Auditorium and inviting him to Los Angeles. Mr. Brown was quick to appreciate the fact that in the spacious theater he could adequately put on big stuff, and be accepted.

"Home, Sweet Home," was the first subject shown. The treatment was so effective the people were sent away in tears. "Then we had the same old struggle again to find a picture big enough to do theatrically," said Mr. Brown. "Along came 'The Spoilers,' which had great heart appeal to West Coast men and women. This picture had great possibilities. You remember how Slapjack stood out, and how at the ending he was lost to view. We determined to drop back to the days of the spectacular. We put on a transformation scene. A young woman, seated in the orchestra, at the ending of the picture, told the story of Slapjack. I built a scene of a promontory and a ship sailing away; practically all the characters were on board. It was early morning. Slapjack seated on a rock watched the departing ship. As the boat moved away in the distance Slapjack stood up, filled his corncob pipe, lighted it, sat down again, and dropped his head in his hands. The orchestra meantime was playing appropriate music. Our people went out crying.

"We went along on those lines for nine or ten weeks. Each subject put on required, of course, a transformation to fit the story. It got to be the toughest job I ever tackled in my life. Some pictures were not suited to the transformation, so we abandoned the idea. We put on the stuff in the straightaway until along came 'The Clansman.'"

It may be of interest right here to quote the program of the Auditorium. "To select and cut the scenes it was necessary to run the twelve reels comprising the story eighty-four times," it says, "and also to render a perfect score six complete full orchestra rehearsals were necessary." Carli D. Elinor conducts the orchestra. A sextet of singers adds to the charm of the production by its work at effective points.

In putting on "The Sign of the Rose," Mr. Brown has arranged for thirty minutes of spoken drama, to follow the nine reels of pictures. The scene will be of the flower shop and the players, including Mr. Beban, will be those in the final scene of the picture. A superstage 30 by 40 feet will be constructed six feet above the regular stage, so as to fit the opening of the curtain in front of the screen. Mr. Brown aims to transform the silent drama into the spoken form without breaking the illusion.

The prices of admission to "The Clansman" are 25, 50, 75 cents and $1. Mr. Clune, who dropped into Mr. Brown's office while the writer was there, called attention to the fact that the Griffith picture at the auditorium has played to more money in one week than has ever been taken in by any dramatic attraction that has visited Los Angeles, opera, of course, excepted.

"Mr. Brown, I am bound to say I think your exhibition of 'The Clansman' is going to have influence on the exhibition of pictures in big theaters throughout the country," suggested the World man.

"Well," replied the manager, "the possibilities for embellishment are wonderful. We feel that we can heighten the dramatic effect of a picture, and also that we have demonstrated we can put on subjects in this theater that will please the people where the same stories in some other places have not been so successful. Patrons come to us and tell us that. We want big subjects. I believe there is a great field for producers of big subjects. If in the auditorium we have done anything to convince manufacturers that this is so we think we have accomplished some good.

"One of the great secrets of the success of the auditorium is the perfect harmony as to policy existing between Mr. Clune and myself. Never in my life have I worked with a man who will go so far to get effects. Mr. Clune has given me every support, in advice, in assistance and in the expenditure of money." BLAISDELL.

Frank Daniels

FRANK DANIELS, son of I. H and Belinda Daniels, who was known for years as the "King of the Comic Opera Stage," was born in Dayton, Ohio. Among the earliest of his recollections is the moving of his family from Dayton to Boston, Mass., in which city he lived until he began fighting life's battle on his own account. Mr. Daniels received his early education in the public schools of Boston. In the New England Conservatory of Music he studied voice culture until the lure of the comic opera stage attracted him and he joined the Boston Opera Company, presenting light operas, under the management of George A. Jones, with which organization he stayed for one season. This engagement was not only Mr. Daniels' first theatrical engagement, but his first money-making position, and not only established him as a footlight favorite, but showed him the way to add materially to his salary.

Frank Daniels.

Mr. Daniels' next engagement was with "The Electric Doll," under the management of John Norris, following which he and William H. Harris "put on" the first "Peck's Bad Boys" company ever organized, Mr. Daniels playing the original Bad Boy for ten weeks. It was at this time Hoyt and Thomas were beginning to break into the limelight, and Mr. Daniels negotiated with them for an equal interest in "The Rag Baby," the first of the tremendously successful plays, the style of farce comedy with music that later made the name of Hoyt a household word. "The Princess Bonnie" was the next comic opera in which Mr. Daniels appeared, this engagement lasting a season.

Then followed five years of uninterrupted financial and artistic successes as a star under his own management in "Little Puck."

After a period, Mr. Daniels was induced to become a moving picture star. Although similar, the work is yet different, but Mr. Daniels readily adapted himself to the restriction of the nine-foot line and is injecting in the screen story that peculiar personality that was his distinguishing characteristic on the legitimate stage. The first picture in which the popular comedian posed was a three-part feature, "Crooky Scruggs," written especially for him by Paul West, and produced under the direction of C. Jay Williams for the Vitagraph Company.

FAHRNEY WITH "MinA."

The manufacturers of the MinA brand of comedies have re-engaged Milton H. Fahrney as director in their Los Angeles studios. At the time MinA films were made in the East Mr. Fahrney served as chief director, but when the producing company was moved to the Coast he found it impossible to accompany the force because of previously made arrangements that necessitated his stay in New York. These plans fulfilled Mr. Fahrney accepted the offer to return to MinA. He will begin work at once.

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

FIGHTING CENSORSHIP IN MASSACHUSETTS.

An Appeal to Bay State Exhibitors to Support the Opposition to the Proposed Law.

AS THE result of the recent action of the Massachusetts State Senate's indorsement of censorship of moving pictures by the State Board of Labor and Industries, when it substituted, for an adverse report of the committee on mercantile affairs, a bill to that effect by a vote of 32 to 7, President Ernest H. Horstmann of the Massachusetts Motion Picture Exhibitors' League has launched an active campaign in an endeavor to defeat this bill.

On last Thursday afternoon, mass meetings of exhibitors were held at Springfield and Boston. The Springfield meeting was under the direction of President Horstmann and Fred B. Murphy of the New England office of the United Film Service. The Boston meeting was called to order by Frank J. Howard, New England's pioneer exhibitor.

All exhibitors are urged to consult with the Senator from their district as soon as possible. It is to their advantage that they explain to the Senators the dangers which will be brought about by the passage of this bill. It is to be regretted that Massachusetts exhibitors have displayed so little interest in this bill, which will tend to ruin the moving picture business in the state. A majority of the exhibitors seem to think that the officers of the league are the ones who should oppose the bill, but they never stop to consider that the representative from their district has a vote as to whether or not the bill will become a law.

During the present legislative session and in past years, the fight against legislation adverse to the moving picture industry has been led by President Horstmann and less than a dozen of his associates. This state of affairs should not be continued. It is not at all fair to Mr. Horstmann and the others that they should work unaided.

It behooves every moving picture man in the Bay State to confer with the Senator from his district immediately. The passage of this bill means an infringement on an exhibitor's rights as a citizen of a free country. It tends to deprive the exhibitor of his freedom, when he is not allowed to give his patrons what they want, simply because a board of censors will not stamp their approval on a certain film.

Exhibitors of Massachusetts, do not disregard this matter. Attend to it immediately. Fight for your rights, Show the Bay State Senate that there is strength in your organization. Show them that this bill, which is backed by a number of women, who, having no business of their own to attend, must interfere with the rights of others, is bound to ruin the industry in the state.

The bill first came up for consideration over two weeks ago. The committee to which it was referred reported that it should be referred to the next General Court. When this report was made in the Senate Chamber, Senator Sanford Bates moved for substitution. This action was postponed. It came up again during the past week. A large delegation of women, representing various women's organizations throughout the state appeared in favor of it. Senator Bates said that the measure is favored by these women who have given careful study to the problem of moving pictures as affecting the habits of children. He said that other states have adopted censorship methods. He also stated that the National Board of Censorship is only a voluntary proposition and has no great effect.

The bill was opposed by Senator James Timilty for the committee on mercantile affairs, who said that it would place in the hands of the State Board of Labor and Industries a powerful political weapon. In view of the fact that the federal government is considering a censorship bill, he said the legislation is not necessary.

The bill was further opposed by Senator Doyle of New Bedford and Senator Gifford of Barnstable and was favored by Senator Gordon of Springfield and Senator Fay of Medford. On the roll call the seven Senators who opposed the bill were Doyle of New Bedford, Gifford of Barnstable, Leonard of Boston, McGonagle of Boston, Sullivan of Boston, Tetler of Lawrence and Timilty of Boston.

This bill was presented to the Senate by Senator Bates at the petition of Carl Carstein, special agent of the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. It provides that all films shall be censored by the State Board of Labor and Industries at a cost of $1 for each $1,000 feet.

DETROIT EXHIBITORS' BALL.

Highly Successful Social Function Enjoyed by Picture Men and Their Friends.

WHEN a few motion picture exhibitors get together they generally have a good time, but when several hundred meet for social purposes, bring along their families and friends, you can rest assured that they are having "the time of their lives." After weeks and weeks of preparation, the Detroit Motion Picture Exhibitors' League gave its first annual ball at the Arcadia, Woodward avenue and Stimson place, Thursday evening, April 15, which was attended by some twelve hundred people, men, women and children. The affair was in every way the success that the Executive Committee had predicted it would be. In fact, it was more successful. Even in the afternoon of the same day, exhibitors called up one another and said they "sort of felt in their bones" that there wouldn't be many people up there. The local newspapers had given a great deal of publicity to the affair and cards had been placed in all of the leading theaters announcing the sale of tickets.

It was 8:30 Thursday evening when people started to arrive. By nine o'clock there were several hundred and they continued to come by the dozens. By ten o'clock over a thousand were in the spacious hall, and still they kept on coming. In this connection it might be said that the Arcadia is one of the most beautiful dancing academies in the country, and the management went to special pains to make it look attractive for the motion picture exhibitors. In the balcony, the seats had been arranged for box parties, while on the main floor arrangements had also been made to take care of private parties.

Among those who occupied boxes were John H. Kunsky and George W. Trendle, with their families, and Honorable Oscar B. Marx, Mayor of Detroit. Right here let it also be said the very best people in the city were present at the ball. Most of the men, including the exhibitors and those allied with the moving picture industry, were in full dress, while most of the ladies were in evening gowns. The manager of the Arcadia told the writer that the ball compared favorably with any of the society functions held there this season. The orchestra was screened with palms on a large stage at one end of the hall, and they played everything from one-steps, and waltzes to the modern fox-trots. During the evening several professional dancers demonstrated their versions of the latest dances.

Owing to the late arrival of some of the film stars, the principal one being Richard Travers, of the Essanay company, and members of the "Dancing Around" company, which was playing a local engagement, the grand march did not start until eleven p. m. It was lead by Mayor Marx and his daughter; next came Richard Travers and a prominent society woman; then came the remainder of the film stars, followed by Mr. and Mrs. Kunsky, Mr. and Mrs. Trendle and motion picture exhibitors. Dancing continued until one a. m. While the people who came expected to see more prominent film stars they had a good time just the same. The music was excellent and the hall looked wonderful with its myriad of colored lights and special decorations.

It was one of those affairs where everybody feels as if they know everybody else. If anybody went away without having a good time, it was their own fault. Surely, the committee in charge did everything possible to make the stay of those who came a great pleasure. Howard O. Pierce, chairman of the executive committee, worked faithfully and untiringly arranging the various details, and to him and the members of his committee are due the great success of the first ball given by the Detroit Motion Picture Exhibitors' League. Mr. Pierce was expecting present Mary Nash, Clara Kimball Young, King Baggot, Marc McDermott and Pearl White, but none of them were able to come according to telegrams sent the day of the ball.

That there will be another dance next year there isn't the least doubt; in fact, already some of the members have discussed ways and means of making the 1916 affair even more successful.

HARMONY AT BUFFALO.

New York State Exhibitors Get Together and Elect New Officers for State League—Lee Ochs of New York City Is President.

(By The Moving Picture World Staff Correspondent.)

THE annual meeting of the New York State Branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America convened at three o'clock Wednesday afternoon in the Statler Hotel, Buffalo. State President Wolff had sent out invitations to exhibitors in all the big cities of the state urging attendance in view of the threatened legislation hostile to the motion picture interests. Exhibitors began to arrive early at the hotel, President Wolff being one of the first men to reach the city. New York City was represented by a delegation consisting of Lee A. Ochs, the president of the New York local; M. Oestreicher and Samuel Trigger. The latter had left the train at Syracuse and brought a small delegation from that city with him. He and his delegation were warmly greeted.

Among the exhibitors in attendance were J. F. Nagle, of the Temple theater, Geneva; E. Wolff, representing a syndicate owning a chain of motion picture theaters in the central and northern part of the state; W. H. Linton, of Little Falls, who acted as treasurer of the association; Harry Lumber, owning theaters in Niagara Falls and Utica; John A. Pferd, Pastime theater, Buffalo; J. D. Parmelee, Tri-Street theater, Buffalo; Geo. F. Flaherty, of the Grand theater, Batavia; Frank Nowak, Lincoln theater, Buffalo; Lewis Isenberg, Alendale theater, Buffalo; B. G. Gibbons, Rex and Regent theaters, Syracuse; William A. Bean, of the Majestic theater, Buffalo; Richard Gettel, of the Mirror theater, Buffalo; Geo. W. Evans, Clinton theater, Rochester; G. W. Erdmann, Elmwood theater, Buffalo; A. J. Hoch, Gem theater, Buffalo; Elmer S. Davis, Keith theater, Buffalo, and A. Wolski, Kosciusko theater, Buffalo.

The meeting was called to order by National President Marion S. Pearce, who had been on the ground early and was given a cordial greeting by all present. Mr. Pearce expressed his gratification at the attendance and the atmosphere of harmony prevailing. Touching the question of amalgamation Mr. Trigger, of New York, speaking to a motion for harmonization, assured the meeting that the association stood ready to join the league at once. Mr. Pearce urged a speedy reunion of all exhibitors in the state of New York. He said no state needed organization more than New York and none in which the state of organization was less satisfactory. Mr. Linton took the floor to say that he heartily favored amalgamation. Richard Gettel also declared in favor of amalgamation on behalf of the association.

Mr. Pearce then announced that State President A. N. Wolff had requested him to say to the meeting that he wished to resign as state president. Mr. Wolff, through Mr. Pearce, declared that he had no grievances against any one and that if he had done anything strange or offended anyone he was sorry for it. Mr. Wolff said he was in favor of a strong state wide organization in which all past factional differences should disappear forever. He said he had done his duty as he saw it and both he and his colleagues had worked for the league to the best of their ability and without any financial assistance other than that which came from the local Rochester organization. The resignation of Mr. Wolff, as president of the state league, was then accepted unanimously.

John A. Pferd, of Buffalo, was then nominated for president, but declined. R. Gettel also was nominated and also declined. Lee A. Ochs was then nominated for president and accepted. There was no further nomination and Mr. Ochs was elected and at once took the chair, to which he was invited by National President Pearce.

In assuming his new office Mr. Ochs thanked the convention for the honor bestowed on him and then urged union and cooperation in the future.

The resignation of M. L. Fleischman, as secretary of the State League, was tendered in writing and accepted. J. B. Parmelee, of Buffalo, was nominated by Samuel Trigger for first vice-president. There were no other nominations and Mr. Parmelee was elected.

A. N. Wolff was nominated for second vice-president and elected without opposition. The office of the secretary was left vacant for the present and the present state officers were empowered to fill it at their discretion. Mr. Linton, of Little Falls, was elected state treasurer by acclamation. Samuel Trigger was elected as national vice-president by acclamation.

A resolution was adopted approving the plan of the Moving Picture World to urge an amendment to the state constitution seeking to place the motion picture on the same plane as the press and to kill censorship in the Empire State for the next generation. It was also ordered to prepare a certified copy of the resolutions and forward the same to the constitutional convention of this state.

A committee consisting of Messrs. Wolff, Bean and Linton was appointed to send a word of thanks and recognition to W. S. Hubbard, the outgoing secretary. A committee consisting of Messrs. Pferd, Bean and Gentle was appointed to audit the books of the outgoing secretary and treasurer.

In view of the fact that no exhibitors were present from Albany, Troy, Schenectady and Binghamton it was decided to postpone the election of delegates to the National Convention at San Francisco. A resolution was then passed to invite the presidents of all the local organizations to meet for the purpose of selecting the delegates to the National Convention.

W. STEPHEN BUSH.

WORK FOR THE LEAGUE.

National President Pearce Makes Strong Appeal to Exhibitors to Join the Organization.

I HAVE just returned from a trip to New York in the interest of the National Convention to be held in San Francisco July 13 to 16, and am very glad to report that your National officers have been cordially received by the manufacturers and other trade interests and that the convention is receiving their hearty support.

Never has there been a time when the League needed this support more than right now; for this reason the friendly attitude of trade and press is doubly welcome and cause for self-congratulation upon the part of every exhibitor.

Just one cause has brought about this splendid effect—is the personal interviews of your National officers with the executives of the largest concerns in the business. During these interviews your officers have been taken to task severely at times for the errors made by our organization in the past. We have freely admitted our faults, but on the other hand have been equally forceful in directing attention to errors of the producers resulting in injustices to exhibitors.

Honest criticism, sincerely offered, always produces good, and this, together with the free exchange of ideas has produced a wave of advancement that led to better understandings all around and from which the League will receive great benefit.

A future plan, or policy of the League has been discussed and the manufacturers have assured us they will cooperate in what the League is trying to do. In return we have pledged the exhibitor to fair treatment and cooperation in fighting the many dangers that threaten their business now.

Now, Brother Exhibitor, "it's up to you." We cannot expect to continue in the favor of the press and enjoy the support of the trade, unless we make good.

An appaling number of laws that are positively vicious and regulations most unfair have been enacted or attempted during the past year. Some directed against one branch of the business, some against another. But that which injures one branch of the business reflects upon and injures all branches.

But get this: In all localities where there has been a good strong Exhibitors' League, this adverse legislation has been defeated. Doesn't that mean anything to you?

Organization is the key to the whole situation. It's the one tocsin that should whip us all into line for a fight that is to decide the very future existence of every exhibitor and for every manufacturer as well. The president of one of the largest film corporations stated emphatically that the onerous burdens imposed upon his company through censorship and other drastic regulations had resulted in their very seriously considering whether after all it was not best to discontinue business. To stay in business and meet these conditions, an entire change in their system would have to be made at enormous cost. And who pays the freight? It strikes me that it is up to the League and to each individual member of it to lend a willing hand and pull with all his might to offset a condition of this sort.

That is what the League is for. Let's show the trade that while organized for mutual protection and while demanding just and fair treatment for ourselves, we are willing and ready to render them effective assistance and co-operation in fighting any danger that threatens any branch of the business.

If every exhibitor will do this, we will have an organization that it will be a pride and pleasure to belong to, and every manufacturer in the country will be only too glad to recognize in the League a powerful factor for good, one that proved a real ally in times of greatest need.

Don't side-track this matter until tomorrow. Do it now. Join the League. If there is no local in your state or town, write to me about starting one, or joining the National body direct. Fraternally yours,

MARION S. PEARCE,
National President.

ANTI-CENSORSHIP PRESS NOTICES.

The Moving Picture World has prepared a special collection of press notices for the anti-censorship campaign. These notices are in typewritten form of varying lengths and prepared in such a way as to appeal to editors. Exhibitors will render the cause of the freedom of the screen a service by trying to place at least part of the notices with their local papers. These typewritten forms may be had for the asking and will be sent free of charge to any exhibitor who writes to us that he is able to make use of them.

Taking Denver Out of Jitney Class.

G. H. Graves, the Only Exhibitor Who Has Made a Ten-Cent House in the Colorado City Profitable, Tells How He Did It.

G. H. GREAVES, manager of the Princess theater, Denver, Col., and secretary of the Moore & Greaves Amusement Company, the exhibitor who made ten-cent admission in Denver possible, spent last week in New York, renewing old acquaintances and getting in touch with conditions here. It was his first trip East in three years, for he has been busy answering the assertion "it can't be done," when mention was made of something better than nickel theaters for Denver. The fight was long and for a time expensive; but during the past few months Mr. Greaves has proved conclusively enough that it can be done. More than that, it is being done, and profitably, too, at his Princess theater.

G. H. Greaves.

During a call at the office of the Moving Picture World, Mr. Greaves recounted something of his experiences as an exhibitor in Denver, where he located as the manager of a small house in 1907. In a humble way he introduced pictures in the Colorado city, and now in a quite pretentious way, he continues to present pictures, not only in Denver, but in Pueblo, Colorado Springs and Cheyenne, as well. In these cities there is the nucleus of a chain of houses that may be extended; but that is the beginning of another story and has no bearing on how Mr. Greaves brought his theater out of the jitney class.

Since the beginning of moving picture time, the public of Denver had been taught to believe that five cents was the top price for photoplay entertainment. Whatever the propram, no one thought of charging more until William W. Hodkinson told Mr. Greaves of his good fortune in raising prices in San Francisco and made it appear that what is good for one city is good for another. That was in January, 1913. Counting on the General Film Company to back them up during the lean weeks, the exhibitors turned the Princess and Iris into ten-cent houses and prepared for a campaign to change public opinion. With one accord the press of Denver protested that a dime was exorbitant for moving pictures, and with one accord the patrons took the same stand. They boycotted the ten-cent houses and flocked to the nickel theater on the next block. Both Mr. Hodkinson and Mr. Greaves retained faith in the correctness of their policy; but meanwhile shows were being run at a consistent loss. The people of Denver, with the newspapers for a mouthpiece, refused to countenance the change, so after a few trying months the houses were closed. Their business was ruined.

The old Iris still remains vacant, but S. L. Baxter built a new Iris on the next block and opened it at nickel prices. Mr. Greaves also reopened the Princess on the former scale and then began an adroit campaign to change the attitude of his patrons and the press. Every now and then when he had something particularly good, he charged ten cents and he advertised in the newspapers. Gradually he altered the notion that everything appearing on the screen is worth just so much, no more, no less, and in this manner, without arousing antagonism, he paved the way for a second venture with a ten-cent house in Denver.

The Princess was closed for the last week in November, 1914, and when the doors were thrown open again, the patrons found a remodelled, redecorated building, with an artistically arranged stage, an orchestra of sixteen pieces and Paramount pictures on the screen. It cost ten cents to get inside and fifteen cents for a seat on the lower floor in the evening, but this time people were ready to test the entertainment at least once, for the newspapers said it was worth while and the lobby looked inviting. They came again, and have been coming ever since, although in the immediate neighborhood other large theaters are available for just half the price. With a six-reel program, generally using a Paramount or a World Film feature for the main attraction, Mr. Greaves is meeting the strongest kind of competition, yet steadily building up a larger business. Customarily the program is changed every second day, but when a picture, such as "Hypocrites," warrants a more extended run, it is used for a full week.

The success of the policy at the Princess is attributed in no small degree to the liberal use of advertising space in the daily papers, especially in the Denver Post, and to the ingenious publicity work of H. E. Ellison. Mr. Greaves does not object to paying $200 weekly for newspaper advertising when he believes that a new class of patrons is being drawn to his theater, nor does he regard an illumination of 33,000 candle power in tungsten lights on the front of the house to be money wasted, although it costs $60 a week. Now that Mr. Greaves has proved that a ten-cent photoplay theater in Denver may be conducted at a profit, other exhibitors, so rumor has it, are considering a revised scale of prices.

THE FILM CAME BACK.

Exchangemen know what it means to have a reel of pictures come back with a hundred feet or so missing. Sometimes the lost film is recovered; more times it is not. Who takes it, and what they do with it is not always clear, but operators are suspected of making these cut outs. Joe Miles, of Lloyds Films, who is handling a series of comedy pictures, recently had an experience along these lines that was so unusual he could not resist telling about it. One of the reels he was handling was 150 feet short when he took it. No effort was made to locate the missing part and the reel was continued in service. The other day when the picture came back to Lloyds Film exchange for inspection, behold the missing 150 feet had been restored. In all his long experience Joe declares that this is the first time a piece of film ever came back.

STOLEN FILMS.

Copies of the Thanhouser two-reel photoplay, "The Final Reckoning," and the Reliance single reel photoplay "The Express Messenger," have been lost or stolen from the Mutual Film Exchange in New York City. Any information concerning these two subjects will be greatly appreciated by the management of the Corporation. Address communications to J. N. Naulty, vice-president, No. 71 West 23d street, New York.

KNICKERBOCKER FILM CO. GOES TO CANDLER BUILDING.

The Knickerbocker Industrial & Educational Film Co., makers of advertising, educational and scientific motion pictures, and who are selling agents for the Cosmograph portable motion picture projector, has moved its offices from 1 Church street, New York, to larger quarters in the Candler Building, 220 West 42d street.

Vitagraph's First Serial.

In "The Goddess," Gouverneur Morris is Credited with the Creation of a Modern Joan of Arc.—A Story With a Big Idea.

ALBERT E. SMITH of the Vitagraph Company is deeply interested in Vitagraph's first serial, "The Goddess," to be released on the General Film Company program in weekly two-reel installments, beginning May 10, the story to be published simultaneously in newspapers circulated in every large city in the country. As set forth to a representative of the Moving Picture World, Mr. Smith has definite reasons for confidence in the success of "The Goddess."

Anita Stewart and Earle Williams in "The Goddess."

"The conventional series, with its dependence upon dime novel situations, is being done to death," he said, "and we are not falling into line at this late day to make another version of incidents that have been presented times without number. If we didn't have something new we would not think it worth while to enter the serial field. 'The Goddess' will have no more in common with the ordinary melodrama than has a story in the Century magazine with the fiction prepared for circulation among messenger boys. The public knows the quality of the work of Gouverneur Morris and Charles W. Goddard, who have combined in writing a story of charm and real substance, in every way suited to the personalities of Anita Stewart and Earle Williams, cast in the leading roles. Director Ralph W. Ince has completed eight installments already and the plot is good for many more. It would not be surprising if 'The Goddess' ran twenty issues and I am certain that audiences will agree with us in thinking that the stories are interesting and of a superior tone."

E. A. MacManus of the Hearst papers, who is handling the newspaper end of the proposition, and who is generally conceded to be the originator of the "see it on the screen and read it in the paper" idea, regards "The Goddess" as the first bona fide serial ever prepared for motion pictures. This does not mean that he underrates the value of previous productions released in installments, rather, he feels that they served and are serving their purpose very well, but there has been no pretense of an idea such as finds expression in Mr. Morris's story. He believes that it will come to be known as "The Serial Beautiful," and even the advertising pertaining to the film will be prepared with this conception of the production in mind. Mr. MacManus has evolved a series of unique newspaper displays, at once striking and dignified and suggestive of the nature of the picture.

Present day problems are treated with sincerity and a deal of imagination, according to Mr. MacManus. "Of course it is fiction, but fiction based on vital facts of twentieth century life," he said. "And Mr. Morris has created a real character, a modern Joan of Arc, who is reared on a desert island in the belief that she is a goddess, and who escapes from the island and comes in contact with all the social forces that go to make up our complex civilization. The authors of 'The Goddess' assumed that big business was the dominant factor during the first decade of the twentieth century, just as in earlier periods people were ruled by monks, were subjected to the feudal system, or paid homage to kings.

"As everyone realizes, the influence of kings has been on the wane for the last 100 years, and as power shifted from kings to great financiers, so it may shift, in turn, from the financiers to the great body of the people. In other words, public opinion may govern the world. Mr. Morris opens his story with a group of men, representing the all-powerful aristocracy of wealth, seated around a table and engaged in earnest discussion. They are beginning to fear for their authority and decide that if public opinion is to rule the world, they must mold public opinion to suit their needs. But how may this be done? The happy idea of creating a beautiful woman and transforming her into a goddess accustomed to do their bidding seems promising. An infant girl is kidnapped and taken to an uninhabited island, where she is reared in the belief that she is a messenger from Heaven destined to influence the judgment of ordinary mortals.

"But the plans of the money lords go awry, for their goddess escapes from the island before her education in the philosophy of business is complete, and under the guidance of a friendly human (Earle Williams) she goes about the world spreading the gospel of kindness and love. She faces the problems of anarchists, of socialists, labor questions, modern Christianity; the men and women in every walk of life, in fact, are influenced by the strength of her wonderful personality."

Mr. MacManus explained that each installment had been arranged in a way to prevent a sense of incompleteness and that there were many opportunities for charming woodland settings and striking bits of artistic photography. In every department, "The Goddess" is being devised to fulfill the demands of "The Serial Beautiful."

Popular Film Man of Pittsburgh Leaves East to Locate in Dallas, Tex.

LEO F. LEVISON, who has won many friends in filmdom and whose last active connection was in Pittsburgh with the World Film Corporation, has resigned his position with that company and is now in Dallas, Texas, where he is managing the Fox Film Corporation in the territory of which Dallas is the centre. Mr. Levison has not only loyally stood by his employers, but he has proved himself a man of affairs in the world of motion pictures. He was familiar with all the practical problems that confront the exhibitor and he delighted to aid in the solving of these problems. Hence the keen regret with which many of the exhibitors in the Pittsburgh district view his departure for other fields. In the great fight which the film interests of Pennsylvania made to repeal the obnoxious censorship law Mr. Levison took a conspicuous part aiding the legislative committee, of which he was a member, both by his voice in council and by his purse. His many friends wish him success in his new field.

HORSLEY IN NEW YORK.

David Horsley, president of the Centaur Film Company, arrived in New York on Thursday from Los Angeles to take up several important business matters that await his attention. He expects to remain in the East only long enough to dispose of these matters and will then return to Los Angeles to supervise the completion of his new studios.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Fake Moving Picture Schools Exposed in Chicago.

FOR some time past the advertising columns of Chicago's Sunday papers have fairly teemed with advertisements inserted by promoters of "schools," in which it was claimed the art of moving picture acting would be taught any young man or woman who could pay $50 to $100 for a course. These "schools" were not only advertised in Chicago papers, the advertising columns of some of the most widely read magazines in the country were also used. Now the Chicago Tribune has made an expose of the methods of some of these "schools," and the dupes have had their eyes opened. It is hoped that the Tribune will continue its campaign of enlightenment, as there are still many more of these fake establishments in existence in the city, and some of them have seemingly respectable, but deceptive, surroundings.

In nearly every case the advertisements promise not only tuition, but the placing of pupils with some leading manufacturing concern. Some of the promoters, however, are more wary. They do not promise to place their pupils, but they do promise to teach them and to engage them in their own productions should they prove capable. In every case the result is the same; the pupils lose their money and their time, and fail to find employment in any studio.

Wm. H. Selig, president of the Selig Polyscope Company, and George K. Spoor, president of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, gave their opinions regarding these "schools."

Said Mr. Selig: "So-called schools of motion picture acting are not legitimate. Not one of them of which I have any knowledge has any object but to separate gullible persons from their money."

Mr Spoor was equally strong in denouncing them. He said: "To protect their dupes, those who have posibilities as well as those who have not, we wish to make known that no person who comes from one of the schools will be employed in any circumstances."

Some of the so-called "directors" in these "schools" claimed to have brought out well known moving picture stars, and were so bold as to name several prominent photoplay actors and actresses now working in Chicago and elsewhere. The victims are from all parts of the country and they have been bled until the last dollar was gone.

The case of a Miss Scanlon, as recited in the Tribune, will serve as a warning to all the simpletons who pay heed to such advertisements. "We're just milked along by these fellows," she said, "and wafted out of the door when our money's gone. What did I do? Nothin'. I just stood around and they done it for me. They got my money and I got some fine instruction on how to be an expensive parasite, which same I'll never need, thank you.

"O, it's a fine graft!" she added scornfully, "roping in' girls that can't spare the money—romantic simpletons! I am going to get out a warrant for Mr. Gilbert Shorter unless my attorneys are able to make him refund part of my tuition."

Miss Scanlon said she was attracted by an advertisment of the Gilbert Shorter school and applied for admittance. She said she agreed to pay for five lessons in advance of the twenty lesson course, at the end of which the director would tell her whether there was hope.

There was hope, she said, up to the sixteenth lesson. Then as the time approached for her to appear in the pictures, as promised in the advertisement, they gently showed her where the carpenter had made a door to go out by and expressed their regrets.

"It's a tough outlook," she sighed, "especially when we was all gazin' at jobs at least $100 fat, not to mention a place in the heart of the great American public."

Miss Scanlon said the Gilbert Shorter studio and a number of other actor factories in Chicago ought to be exposed and put out of business, "for the sake of the poor simps like myself that give up their jobs for fame that is phony."

The Milwaukee Photo-play College is an out-of-town dupe factory that has come in for exposure. A counter man in a quick lunch room was one of its victims. He came to Chicago to claim a position at the Essanay studio for character and leading parts. He had to walk back to Milwaukee, where he is now filling his old job. He failed to persuade the "school" director to refund any part of his tuition fee.

The College Film Company of Chicago has also come into the limelight. "Prof." Eugene Stockdale, assistant director, claims a share in bringing out Mary Pickford; "Prof." Hitchcock, of the same establishment, is advertised to the dupes as "America's foremost photoplayer of character parts."

Text of Act Governing Johnson-Willard Fight Films.

In answer to several inquiries regarding the bringing into this country of the films taken of the Johnson-Willard fight, it may be stated that an act of Congress, approved July 31, 1912, in the matter of prize fight pictures, reads:

"That it shall be unlawful for any person to deposit or cause to be deposited in the United States mail for delivery, or to deposit or cause to be deposited with any express company for the purpose of delivery, or to bring into the United States from abroad any film or other pictorial representation of a prize fight or encounter of pugilists, under whatever name, which is designed to be used, or may be used, for the purpose of public exhibition."

The penalty attachel to a violation of the act is a fine up to $1,000 and one year's imprisonment, or both.

Report on Ventilation of Chicago Picture Theatres.

The Chicago commission on ventilation, of which Dr. Geo. B. Young and Dr. E. V. M. Hill represent the health department, turned in the first report recently. The commission was organized in February, 1910.

The report gives the opinions of the commission on ventilation and the results of tests in moving picture theatres, passenger cars, etc. On moving picture theatres the report states: "So far as the comfort as well as the health of the theatre patrons is concerned, there is required a better connection between the heating and ventilating system of picture theatre buildings."

Many Protests Against Showing "The Birth of a Nation" in Chicago.

Heated discussions and speeches and letters by several prominent citizens still continue against the giving of permission to show "The Birth of a Nation" in Chicago. Jane Addams and others protest against its exhibition because of its injustice to colored people. Miss Addams has said:

"The producer seems to have followed the principle of gathering the most vicious and grotesque individuals he could find among the colored people and showing them as the representatives of the truth about the entire race. It is both unjust and untrue. The same method could be followed to smirch the reputation of any race.

"Moreover, it appeals to race prejudice upon the basis of conditions of half a century ago, which have nothing to do with the facts we have to consider today. Even then it does not tell the whole truth. It is claimed that the play is historical, but history is easy to misuse. It is undoubtedly true that some of the elements of the plot are based on actual events, but they are only a part of the picture. You can use history to demonstrate anything, when you take certain of its facts and emphasize them to the exclusion of the rest. The production is the most subtle form of untruth—a half truth."

It will be remembered that in my letter of April 10 Charles Fitzmorris, Mayor Harrison's secretary, passed on these films and reported to Major Funkhouser that they should be shown in their entirety.

Dishonest Use of "Adult" Sign by Theatres.

The attention of Major Funkhouser has been drawn to the misuse, by certain Chicago exhibitors, of the sign, "Adults Only—No Children Admitted." Reports have been made that thousands of nickels and dimes and quarters have been received at the box office of many theatres through a wrong use of the sign.

Several investigators were sent out by Major Funkhouser to report on fraudulent uses of the "adult" sign. In some instances the violations are said to be so serious that a revocation of the theatre license may follow.

One theatre in the Loop is said to have made the "adult" sign a permanent fixture, and displays it no matter what kind of film is being shown. Some of the South State street houses, where suggestive pictures of oriental dancers are shown in front, also are being investigated.

Correct Statements in News of Moving Pictures Necessary.

With the growing interest of readers in matters pertaining to moving pictures, daily newspapers are constantly adding to the space devoted to such news. But care should be exercised that the writers of this news should be sufficiently familiar with a knowledge of the moving picture business so as to avoid statements that are misleading and sometime ludicrous. The following statement, for example, recently appeared in the Chicago Evening Post, in a moving picture paragraph:

"Interesting statistics of the New York Strand Theatre's first year were presented by A. J. Pardridge, associated with E. C. Divine in the large Chicago enterprise, on their return from an inspection trip to New York. According to Mr. Pardridge, 182,500,000 feet of film have been shown at the Strand Theatre in twelve months."

Now 182,500,000 ft. of film means 182,500 reels for 52 weeks or over 3,500 reels for one week, and in round figures 500 reels per day. As it requires about 15 minutes to project one reel of film properly, it would take just 125 hours, or a little over five days, running 24 hours a day, to run off 500 reels.

Again, basing the daily rental at $10 per reel, a very low figure, the 500 reels woul cost just $1,500 per day, according to the statement given the readers of the Post.

Chicago Film Brevities.

The big Selig features, soon to be released through Vitagraph-Lubin-Selig-Essanay, Inc., will be known as the "Red Seal" photoplays. "The Carpet of Bagdad," the first of the "Red Seal" subjects, will be released May 3rd.

Edgar O. Brooks, western manager of the Cosmofotofilm Co., of New York City, made a call Monday, April 19th. Doings at Los Angeles.

ON SATURDAY NIGHT the Photoplayers, Inc., quietly passed away and is now, in complete and reposeful oblivion. Everything belonging to the club has been put in storage. The closing of the promising club was made because of the failure of a majority of the members to pay their dues. Of late much money had been lost each week, and so it decided "to close while closing was good," i. e., to stop the bills and pay those due while there was money on hand.

Wednesday night Eddie Dillon was to have been toastmaster, so the good members decided to hold a dinner at a local cafe, and to talk over the affair. The dinner was more of a success than any held before. The officials say that the club ought to be reorganized within a month or so.

A bomb explosion, believed by the police to be of black hand origin, Monday night shortly before midnight, tore out the front of the St. Andrews picture theatre. The house is owned by F. E. Bundy, and is valued at $7,000. The force of the blast hurled pieces of marble from the front of the lobby across the street, and fragments of plate glass windows flew onto the lawns across the way. Fortunately no one was in the house at the time. The interior of the house was not injured, but was filled with debris thrown in from the entrance.

The car was then run over the cliff and demolished beyond recognition. The picture was "Cora" and the thrill that goes into the last scene is something great. CLARKE IRVINE.

MANY BIDS FOR "THE MELTING POT."

State rights buyers and those who have been preaching this method of distributing films will be able to take heart to a great extent through the experience of the Cort Film Corporation, which offered "The Melting Pot," with Walker Whiteside in the leading role, to purchasers of territorial rights. It was announced from the offices of John Cort, president of the corporation, this week, that 170 telegrams and a good-sized stack of letters were received within a short time after the advertisements appeared offering the picture in that way.

A representative of Mr. Cort said a big demand was expected for the picture on account of the combination of star, author and play but that they were not prepared for the avalanche of inquiries which descended upon the office. There was a great deal of interest shown throughout the country, much of it being due, no doubt, to Mr. Whiteside's popularity in the west and south where he was a great favorite for many years before he achieved success on Broadway. The picture is booked for the Hippodrome, New York, May 9.

Valentine Grant With Cort

VALENTINE GRANT, whose work in "A Mother of Men," the first film in which she ever appeared, has come along this Spring season and taken away the best of parts assigned by picture producers to their leading women. Miss Grant is now playing opposite to Walker Whiteside in "The Melting Pot," the Zangwill play which is being made for the screen by the Cort Film Corporation.

Valentine Grant.

Miss Grant will be remembered as the young Seattle concert singer who came to New York a few years ago to pursue her studies in voice culture, but turned aside temporarily to play several roles on the screen for Sid Olcott, who was directing for the Warner company. She appeared in a number of films and then accompanied Mr. Olcott's company to Europe when he started on a tour across the Atlantic to make pictures. The trip was cut short by the outbreak of the war and Miss Grant returned to America. While abroad she had a number of interesting parts, nearly all of them being of the Irish colleen sort, which were played in pictures taken amid Irish scenes.

When Mr. Cort began to cast for "The Melting Pot" Miss Grant was chosen for the role of the Baron's daughter and she seems to have fitted into the character of a Russian woman of rank quite as well as she did into the Irish character.

Miss Grant says that she has not given up her vocal art wholly for that of pictures, but she does admit that she enjoys work before the camera very much. She still keeps up her singing, however, and has a grand piano in her apartment uptown where friends often gather of an evening to hear her voice.

POWER'S PATENTS SUSTAINED.

Judge Mayer of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York recently handed down a decision sustaining the patents No. 826,112 on the framing mechanism of a projection machine and No. 959,601 covering the fire valve on the film magazine. Regarding the framing mechanism Judge Mayer said:

"Business ability, finely constructed machine parts and a good selling organization cannot accomplish such a result without a basically satisfactory product. We are not dealing with some pleasing article which, for the time being, catches the public, but with a delicate mechanism which, to succeed, must consistently make good with the exhibitor and the audience. I am fully convinced that the patent is meritorious and should be sustained."

Concerning the fire valve patent the opinion of the Court includes the following:

"We all know that motion picture exhibitions are attended daily by many thousands of people and we all appreciate the danger which would result not only from fire but more seriously, perhaps, from panic. Thus, any instrument of fire protection becomes important which shall instantaneously extinguish fire and be so constructed and adjusted as not to scratch nor impair the film. . . . What the art needed from an efficient and commercial standpoint was a fire protection device which would also protect the film. It must be remembered that the film travels at the rate of about 16 pictures per second, that splices are not unusual and that scratching either destroys or impairs the film to the extent of seriously deteriorating the picture which is thrown on the screen. . . . In my opinion, it required a faculty more than ordinarily to be expected from the man skilled in the art to produce the Power valve. . . . Indeed, the prior art in respect of this device which now looks so simple but which was unattained by others, is, to my mind, convincing proof that what the Power accomplished in this regard was invention."

Moving Picture Educator

Conducted by the REV. W. H. JACKSON

AMONG THE CHURCHES.

A LEADING church paper, "The Expositor," commenting on the fact that one-fifth of the population of the United States goes to moving picture shows every day, contends that they are the greatest power for good of the new century. It also declares that the churches should, by all means in their power, show their approval of all shows that exhibit educational films in preference to the sensational ones.

The "Christian and Work," while calling attention to the great damage done to the liquor traffic by the moving pictures in all the large cities, declares that in one instance the saloon interests offered a film concern $25,000 if they would withdraw a convincing temperance picture until after the spring elections. In Connecticut the liquor men are so filled with apprehension as they see their profit dwindling, that they are asking for a law to compel motion picture exhibitors to pay the state the same license fee they themselves pay.

In New York the Rev. Christian F. Reisner, of the Grace Methodist Church, is running, on Sunday nights, the great Kalem picture, "From Manger to Cross." On Saturday nights he runs feature films with moral precepts; recently he ran "Rose of the Alley." Dr. Reisner is one of the pioneers in church picture work and his success is such as to make him and his church an example to others in large cities. He has also solved the problem of the relation of the church and the pictures; hence he has no time to deliver platitudes against either the picture business or censorship; his church is in consequence eminently successful.

The Rev. C. S. Bucher, of the Grace Congregational Church, Cleveland, Ohio, is a user of the moving pictures with great success, as a stimulus to the Sunday-school work. All scholars who are regular in attendance receive free admission to the show he gives one night each week.

* * *

The Rev. M. W. Warner, pastor of the Methodist Church in Englewood, N. J., is having a moving picture plant installed in his new $50,000 church.

* * *

The Litchfield Congregational Church, Hillsdale, Mich., is described as "placing itself among the leaders for progress" by installing a moving picture plant. It is to be operated two nights each week.

* * *

An Episcopal church in Brooklyn, N. Y., has had the courage to use moving pictures in connection with its Men's Club. This is perhaps the first Protestant Episcopal church in Greater New York to do so.

CENSORSHIP MAD.

Some time ago a writer in The Moving Picture World predicted that the censorship craze would assume such absurd proportions that every little critic would have his own scheme for censorship. This prediction is fulfilled to a most ridiculous degree by a minister in Beloit, Wisconsin—the pioneer state for good pictures—who proposes a local censorship board as follows: Representatives of the City Council, the Federated Women's Clubs, the Child Welfare League, the Board of Education, an astute business man, and a person known for his high ideals of practical and worthy citizenship.

This worthy censor board organizer must think the world moves round his own little horizon or he could not be led astray to make such elaborately absurd proposals.

As the censorship matter now stands, there is a call for a National Board, another for a State Board, again another for each city or town, and last, but not least, in enlightened Beloit each of six local organizations is suggested for censorship.

Truly this is censorship gone mad.

It is further very interesting to notice how this worthy clergyman of Beloit would teach this remarkable board of censors how to proceed and conduct themselves. He says: "They should meet every Monday and Friday, and in the morning too; they must not expect any salary but give their services for the weal and welfare of the Beloit 'we all love so much'."

They must not be prudes, impractical or puritanical, but must give "local exhibitors to understand that if they want the patronage of Beloit what they must do."

Judging from the stern requirements laid down in this bold censorship scheme, coupled with the adjectives used by this clergyman in demanding this strong board, such as "vicious," "salacious," "suggestive," "melodramatic," "frauds," "big blunders" and "the menace of the movies," it cannot but be that the scum and "junk" of the whole realm of moving picture productions of days long gone by must have been dumped upon the poor unsuspecting people of Beloit. For no other reason can we account for the violent use of such strong adjectives, coupled with the demand for such extraordinary censorship. Evidently, if the minister's violent sermon is justified, the whole town must need a guardian to protect it from being taken advantage of. Evidently "the town we love so much" must be in a deplorable condition; and it is an unfortunate thing for one of its ministers to proclaim world-wide this fact, which he should rather have kept secret. We do not recall reading anything similar to his "powerful sermon" since moving pictures were first used; nowhere else needs such censorship; no one else sees such "menace in the movies" or such "frauds." Without doubt, the fault is peculiar and local, and is one of the best evidences that this preacher, in common with many other public men, needs to be enlightened upon the moving pictures themselves—also upon the true aspects of censorship.

Referring to a similar, yet milder, attack, a New Jersey newspaper wisely says:

"The remedy does not lie in an attack upon the films, nor in regulation by censor, but with the public itself, and is a matter of education. Producers of films are not foisting upon the public emotional, cheap or sensational ideas; they know such efforts would be short-lived."

This is the true situation tersely put. Knowledge and education are the best protectors from improper films and the greatest cause for true and proper productions. The growth of the educational powers of the moving picture has proved so reactive that only the good and true satisfies public opinion. The public is the best censor.

"MALL," A $100,000 PICTURE THEATER.

The Mall Theater Company, of Cleveland, Ohio, recently filed incorporation papers. The new company is capitalized at $150,000. The president of the concern is Louis H. Becht, owner of the Mall on Superior avenue, N. E., Cleveland; Fred Desberg, vice-president; Edward P. Strong, secretary, and Joseph Laronge, treasurer. It is the purpose of the company to erect a big moving picture theater, costing $100,000, in lower Euclid avenue, Cleveland. It will be built on a plot of ground 80 by 100 feet in size, and will be able to seat 1,300 persons. Richardson & Yost, Cleveland architects, have prepared plans for the new structure, and Mr. Laronge, the treasurer, says that construction work will be begun at once. It is contemplated that the Mall will be opened and ready for occupancy by next October 1.

"REFORMATION" HAS STRONG APPEAL.

A dramatic and heart reaching drama is told in the American production "Reformation," admirably acted by Henry Otto's company of players with Winifred Greenwood and Edward Coxen in the principal roles. The picture tells a story of regeneration in which a hardened criminal is brought to leading an honest life, through the pleadings of his sister. The scenes throughout are tensely dramatic and hold the story intact until the last.

Four o'Clock School for Salesmen

C. R. Seelye, Director of Sales of the World Film Corporation, Teaches His Force to Use Sound Business Arguments.

By Lynde Denig.

DROP in at the New York office of the World Film Corporation about 4 o'clock of an afternoon and you will be just in time for school—a new kind of school, devoted to "the new religion," subscribed to by Lewis J. Selznick and expounded by Professor C. R. Seelye, otherwise Director of Sales; Professor Jacob Wilk, promoter of Publicity; Professor Milton E. Hoffman, Professor Joseph S. Edelman and all other members of the World Film faculty. Each department head turns instructor, now and then. Each attends the Four o'Clock school and applies the Selznick creed to his own particular specialty, whether it be salesmanship, or the allied arts of advertising and publicity. The pupils, about twenty of them seated in a semi-circle around the room, are prospective salesmen of World Film pictures. If they fail to pass the examination, they are prospective salesmen no longer. Mr. Seelye bows them politely to the door.

C. R. Seelye.

The school is one spoke in the wheel of system on which the World Film is being made to revolve. It is one means adopted by Mr. Seelye for applying commercial methods to the motion picture industry, and the energetic sales director, the authority on co-operation between manufacturer and dealer, declares it is working famously. His salesmen are being standardized, so to speak. Haphazard talking, bombastic arguments with nothing behind them, the stock bluffs of a man who has something to sell, have no place in "the new religion," as preached at Four o'Clock school. It is a religion of facts and every man is taught, first what the facts are, then how to present them to exhibitors. From Maine to California, the World Film graduates are approaching buyers along the same lines. They are telling exhibitors how to make money and each move is, or should be, governed by lessons learned in Mr. Seelye's school. Individual vagaries in sales arguments are not a part of the curriculum. Before the salesman starts talking business, he says in effect: "I am at your service. We will get together on this little problem of making your house pay."

What the School Does.

Picture, then, the semi-circle of students, most of them young, bright looking men, selected on account of their potentialities, rather than because of past accomplishments. They are instructed in the a, b, c's of salesmanship; they are given general sales letters to be studied and digested and they are impressed with the importance of the theories on which the World Film aims to conduct its business. At the head of the sales letters and in black face type at the foot of their weekly bulletin, "The Firing Line," they, read "Watch Us Grow—Grow With Us," until the slogan becomes a part of their business personalities.

The only deal worth making is one that benefits all concerned—the producer, the exhibitor and the salesman. Obviously, the only way to serve an exhibitor is to place nickels and dimes where none were placed before; the one way to serve World Film is to make World Film productions the medium for attracting the additional nickels and dimes, and having done this, the salesman may take comfort in the growth of his own bank account. The student is taught all this, and that the future of the World Film and his own future depend upon yearly contracts, also that the exhibitors must make money.

So much for a working principle that might end in profitless theory. The Four o'Clock school is calculated to teach how a pretty theory may be reduced to dollars and cents with the balance on the credit side of the ledger. The graduate salesman—he is not graduated until examined and found proficient by every department head—is supposed to know more about the showing of photoplays than does the average exhibitor, for he is fortified by the knowledge of half a dozen experts, who have figured out in advance the problems to be overcome.

As the prospective salesman progresses through the various grades of the school, he delivers his sales talk precisely as he would offer it to an exhibitor, figuring out the proper expenditure for advertising of houses large and small, explaining the uses of "paper," of special newspaper campaigns and outlining the entire policy to be followed from the day a picture is booked. For the time being, he is virtually the exhibitor's partner with an equal interest in his success. And if his estimates are correct, with a due regard for the size of the theater and the neighborhood to be drawn from, his figures will show a substantial profit. In the orthodox sales talk, the price to be asked for a film comes after the exhibitor has been told how to better his business.

The Human Equation.

Here is a system of commercial education developed in great detail; but even so the human factor cannot be disregarded. Two instances will illustrate Mr. Seelye's method of recruiting and, when occasion requires, depleting his force. One day a young man entered the World Film office determined to sell a typewriter, an article for which Mr. Seelye had no possible need at the time. Starting in this adverse atmosphere, the salesman worked up his case convincingly.

"You should be selling pictures, not typewriters," said Mr. Seelye. The salesman agreed with him, went to school for a few weeks and now is one of the most successful men on the force.

The second instance is that of a youth who went to school and forgot his lessons. He happened, or rather breezed into Mr. Seelye's office when we were listening to a description of the World Film system. His manner betokened a great rush of business, his clothes found their most vivid expression in a black and white check suit.

"I want you at school this afternoon," said Mr. Seelye.

"But I have an appointment," protested the youth.

"Keep the appointment and get back just as soon as you can. And by the way, I'll tell you why I want you. I understand from an exhibitor that your sales talk is all froth and meaningless promises. I'm going to hear your talk this afternoon, and if it's what he describes, you're through."

There was more color in the young man's face and less briskness in his manner as he replied, "Yes, Sir," and left to keep his appointment.

Mr. Seelye's View of the Future.

Mr. Seelye takes pride in his school, which is only one manifestation of a uniform business. "Everyone of our offices is standardized," he said, "that is every piece of paper is arranged in the same way. All booking and accounting work is done on the same general system. Our theatre card system enables every manager to be in touch with every theater in every town which has a population of over 1,000 at least once a week.

"We are approaching the day of 3,500 seat houses, which will enable exhibitors to advertise extensively and extensive advertising makes features what they should be, and will be, the biggest influence in the life of every community.

"Next a great clearing house company will be necessary for the distribution of films. Supposing the World Film gets 3,000 yearly contract customers. Producers will find it advantageous to distribute through us, because we can guarantee that the pictures will go into 3,000 well run, well advertised houses. The more producers the more theaters and vice versa. In time there will be only one distributing organization, or at the most, two."

DRUM REPORTS ON COAST CONDITIONS.

Harry C. Drum, who is the western division manager of the World Film Corporation, has been in New York for a few days conferring with General Manager Selznick and other officials of the home office. Mr. Drum reports that conditions west of Denver indicate that the feature film is the only secure investment for the motion picture exhibitor. He says that the Panama-Pacific Exposition has caused the San Francisco exhibitors to offer bigger shows to the transients than they had been showing prior to the opening of the Exposition. He feels that the entire Pacific coast will gain for their influx of visitors to the Exposition, and he is also of the opinion that the day of the dollar picture is here, and the wise producer is the one who will supply that demand.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

THIS WEEK I am going to give what so many have been asking for of late, some musical programs, or suggestions for accompanying music. You remember Carrie Hetherington, of course, the lady who is demonstrating the Fotoplayer in Miller's Theater out in Los Angeles, California. She has sent us some interesting "dope" at various times, particularly the musical suggestions for "The Christian," which appeared in the issue of October 17th, 1914, Moving Picture World. Miss Hetherington has sent us a post card bearing her portrait upon one side and the advertisement of the theater on the other. It also carries a statement to the effect that she was the originator of the idea which resulted in the building of the Fotoplayer. So we have reproduced the photograph, to show our readers how the lady looks, while the program, given below, covers what she played for the following two pictures.

Both of which, we believe, will prove of interest.

Carrie Hetherington.

The above program is printed on a sheet separate from the house program, six by nine, blue on white, very neat in appearance. Name of theater at top followed by title of picture and date of performances, then the line "Torpey's Famous Orpheum Orchestra, Reynold C. Peters, Leader." Manager Heiberger says "we are using a six piece orchestra and featuring the music as much as our features." Hope he will remember us with another program in the near future.

Exchanging Programs.

Ottawa, Iowa, in acknowledging benefits derived from musical suggestions in this department, wants to know if matters could not be arranged so musicians could exchange musical programs for the various feature pictures. His idea is that all parties interested can get in touch with one another through this department, and having established a correspondence, shall make copies of their own musical programs to the best pictures and mail the same to each of the others in the pool. It might not be a bad idea, even if you do not always use the other fellow's program verbatum, it is often a great help to get an idea of the general character of the picture beforehand.

Piano Music.

I wish to acknowledge receipt of a folio called "Eclipse Motion Picture Music Folio," compiled by Arthur Lange. It does not say where it is published nor who by, and the letter accompanying has been mislaid. The folio contains fifty pages (fifty-five numbers) standard size music, mostly national airs and descriptive music generally, all useful to picture players. It sells for fifty cents.

Orchestra Music.

M. Winkler, of Brooklyn, N. Y., sends piano and violin parts to "Lake's Loose Leaf Motion Picture Collection." He says he wants me to see what this music is like. Having seen it I can cheerfully say it is all Mr. Winkler claims it to be, a good collection of dramatic numbers long enough to be especially valuable in picture work, all printed on separate sheets for convenience in laying out a program. Wish Mr. Winkler would send me his own address, I'd like to return the compliment.

Lottie Pickford

LOTTIE PICKFORD, the sister of the popular Mary, will play the star feminine role in "The Diamond from the Sky," the "Flying A's" picturized romantic novel that will be released May 3, in conjunction with the newspaper publication of the story in hundreds of metropolitan journals.

Messrs. Hutchinson and Freuler, who preside over the destinies of the American Film Manufacturing Company, were determined to get a Pickford in their cast. It is hinted, however, that Mary, who has developed a keen business acumen, was in a sense instrumental in Lottie taking the part wherein it was originally intended she should appear. The younger Pickford star's work on the screen was carefully scrutinized by the American's staff of directors, and, after some negotiations at Los Angeles, she entered the employ of the American Company.

Lottie Pickford.

Miss Pickford's personality and physique are particularly adapted for the part of the charming heroine, Esther Stanley. This is a sympathetic role, full of dramatic possibilities. Jacques Jaccard, the noted director of the American Film Manufacturing Company, who is personally in charge of the work on the screen novel, says that in all his experience he never found anyone who fitted into the scheme of a big moving picture project as readily as Lottie. This, perhaps, is due to the family's peculiar adaptability to moving pictures.

With the extraordinary publicity that will accompany "The Diamond from the Sky," it is very probable that the younger Pickford's name and face will be as much of a household subject as that of her famous elder sister.

John R. Freuler, president of the North American Film Corporation, reports that preliminary bookings on "The Diamond from the Sky" have exceeded all records. Since the opening of the executive headquarters in Chicago and New York, requests for dates have averaged 200 a day.

On the Battlefields of France

Joe Farnham and Phil Klein on the Lines Occupied by Von Kluck on His Famous "Drive" toward Paris.

LAST February, Joe Farnham, publicity man de luxe, suddenly disappeared from his usual haunts about Forty-second street and the Screen Club, and it was hinted that he had gone to London to join the armies of the Allies fighting in France. Other reports were that he had been engaged by the Carnegie Peace Foundation to take motion pictures in the war region. Nothing further for publication has been heard from Joe until this week, when a letter came through with this information:

"Here we are in an abandoned German trench on the hill just outside of Barberry, France, from which most advantageous position the German army under General Von Kluck placed its artillery protecting the infantry advance on Barberry, Senlis and then on toward Paris, and over which same ground Von Kluck came back on his retreat from the French capital.

"Phil Klein and I came upon this position one afternoon, March 20, after a rather eventful drive behind an old (thirty years or more, it seemed) horse which we had hired in Chantilly the day before and which, for a very large sum of French money being handed over, we persuaded the carriage driver to loan to us for an hour or two longer. He became tired of waiting for our return (it was two days later), and as we afterward learned fell prey to the ever watchful French sentinels who carried him off to the Senlis guard house because he did not possess his 'sauf conduit.'

"We have to date experienced some many eventful hours in our tours through these regions of world battle, but I am sure that the greater part of all this time is being spent in amassing a wealth of motion picture material which will be welcomed by America, as perhaps the only real and authoritative to come from this region. What is being shown there now I am not conversant with, but up to the time of our leaving (February 10), there had been practically nothing which came anywhere near depicting the horrible conditions which really exist here.

"We have been exceptionally favored in our operations by being fortified with permissions of extraordinary nature, and we are, in every instance, receiving a most courteous and cordial reception by both French and English authorities. Our trip may extend over many months more, and there may be more of interest to your readers which from time to time can be sent you."

VENDOME THEATER SUCCUMBS TO PICTURES.

The famous old playhouse of Nashville, Tenn., named the Vendome, will shortly, it is announced, be converted into a high class motion picture theater. The Vendome has had some of the most stirring dramas and leading thespians upon its boards during its career as a so-called legitimate theater. A number of changes are being made in the old structure which will make the Vendome even more popular with the Nashville public. Among these improvements is a new ventilation system, so constructed as to change the air in the auditorium every few minutes. The Vendome has a seating capacity of 1,800, and the gallery will be set aside for colored people. The program will be changed daily.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Mention of Memphis.

ALBERTA CLAIRE, "The Girl from Wyoming," has quit Hot Springs to follow the call of the road and do the publicity for the Great American Shows. She sends in a few impressions of Memphis, from which it would seem that things are not in very good shape in that Tennessee town. She writes:

> There are a plentiful supply of picture houses on either side of Main street, scattered through the shopping district, and all appeared to be doing a good business.
> The two features which impressed me strongest in all of them were the noisy musicians and the noisy audiences!
> As to the music, if such it can be called—imagine a six or eight-piece band, not orchestra, playing with force and vim enough for a circus parade and you have some idea of the noise, and man, I mean just that—NOISE.
> I quizzed around a little regarding the reason of so much "melody." It appears that the unions decide upon how many musicians each house shall employ and the number of hours they shall work, together with all other details, and they refuse to allow any manager to have only a piano player and a drummer, but somehow, even that didn't quite explain the lack of music and the excess of noise.
>
> The five-cent houses use "Automatic" noise, it is considerably softer than the "Chromatic"—one point in its favor, at least.
> I have noticed that you speak against the sound effects used by drummers, I did not agree with you, because the drummers at the three houses in Hot Springs were all using "contraptions" which one of them originated, and which are worthy of note, for Carl Hansen is a clever inventor. He and Tex Griffin really "played the pictures," in such a way as to add to the interest of the watcher always.
>
> Yesterday in one of the ten-cent houses here I was rather enjoying the picture when the "band" came to "work." A character on the screen tapped lightly on a door for admission and Mr. Drummer hammered vigorously on a table with what looked to me like a good-sized tack hammer. Can you beat it?
> Sounds like lying doesn't it?—I assure you I am not exaggerating one bit. But I have rather changed my mind about "sound effects" for promiscuous use.
> Even when the musicians are off duty the houses are far from quiet, there is a continual hum of conversation going on which is very annoying to any one who wishes to study the picture and watch the story unfold.
>
> There is no distinction, the five, ten and fifteen-cent shows are equally patronized by these pests who apparently consider a picture theater the fitting place to converse.
>
> I tried the fifteen-cent house, and as "The Fight" progressed on the screen, with all its strong, interesting scenes, a well-dressed couple discussed some quite personal affairs loud enough to be heard all over the big house.
>
> A baby in its mother's arms cried a little and an usher trotted down the aisle and requested the lady to keep the baby quiet or take it out, yet he quite overlooked the first-mentionad and much more distracting noise—and I am not accustomed to having babies around either!
> Then I went to a five-cent show and two young men possessed of nothing above the eyebrows chattered incessantly through six reels of "A Fool There Was."
>
> I paid ten cents admission next, and two women discussed Easter fashions and criticised May Marsh loud enough for everyone to hear.
>
> Some of the pictures are very good, some not up to the best standard, but that happens everywhere at times.
> Still, for a city of its size, Memphis can stand a lot of improvement in its picture houses, it cannot compare with Little Rock, or San Antonio, or Dallas, the last is a wonder since Mr. Hulsey used "Sapolio" on it, and stirred all the other fellows into action!

Things must be pretty queer in Memphis when a manager can be told whom to hire. It is probably but a reflex of the laxity that seems to mark the entire scheme of management. Even if men must be hired it can be insisted upon that they play their pictures and not merely play, and trap drummers should not be permitted to spoil the effect with uncouth noises.

But the more important matter is the failure to suppress talking while the picture is being run. A little appeal to the audience with slides would quickly cause an abatement of the nuisance and a few tactful hints to the persistent will clean up the job.

Interfering with the personal liberty of the patron is a thing to be avoided whenever possible, but, on the other hand, it is better to lose the patronage of a few thoughtless people than to lose the trade of more who shun a house because they wish to enjoy the silent drama in the silence that the term implies.

Just as a matter of fact there is no reason why there should be any loss of patronage through reproof. Run a slide that says:

Think of Others.

It is courteously requested that there be no talking during the showing of the pictures that all may enjoy the production. This is the "silent drama." Let's make it so.

Half the time talking is mere thoughtlessness and would cease at suggestion. If some persist pass them a card worded:

Most persons enjoy the photoplays best in silence. Please do not annoy others by loud conversation.

Let the ushers give these out, but let him first come to you or to some responsible person that you may decide.

We reproduce four advertisements submitted, among others, by Andrew M. Welliver, Williamsport, Pa. They form an interesting study in the use of boxes for getting and keeping the various section of an advertisement apart:

An Odd Arrangement.

S. R. Berkowitz, advertising man for the Allston theater, Allston, Mass., writes:

> It is certainly with great interest that I read your weekly comment of "Advertising for Exhibitors," and as advertising manager for one of the finest photoplay and vaudeville houses in the country, I would like to join your contributors.
>
> The Allston theater is a new theatrical building having been opened about five months ago. It is situated about three miles from Boston, located so as to draw patronage from four of the finest residential suburbs about Boston, namely, Allston, Brighton, Brookline and Newton.
> As my first contribution I am sending three numbers of my program, which I inaugurated over a month ago and which I handle personally. We use about 5,000 every week.

The program is a nice looking affair with a coated paper cover printed with a special plate, probably run off in quantities. It would be well, if this is the case, to give a second printing for the date on the cover. As it stands the only date is a ten point line on page three; really page five, since the cover is not folioed. The date should be more prominent and each day should be dated. The house runs vaudeville with a change on Thursday and pictures with a change every second day. The result is somewhat confusing until it is figured out, for the program letter stands for one film subject on Monday and Tuesday and another on Wednesday while the latter half of the week the letter shows one film on Thursday and another on Friday and Saturday. Even though it means more composition, it would be better to give a page a day to the program, giving the straight run. Each day should be dated, and the names of the makers of the films should be given. Most persons are interested in the maker and even if this is purely a house program and not for outside distribution, giving the names would help particularly in making business for the last half of the week from patrons who get the issue the first half.

There is a clearly worded column of house information, but no general letter press. It is all program and trade advertisements without even a reference to the underline which is, we think, a grave error.

You can take the check the outside advertiser gives you and say that it is profit, but you cannot tell exactly how much more than the check you have lost through not making proper use of your own publication. Two pages of reading matter and a page of coming attractions might make more business than is represented by the income from three pages of foreign advertising, but it cannot be figured in the same definite way, so the fact is overlooked. Outside advertising is valuable in helping to defray the cost, but it should not rob the house of its most valuable publicity aid.

Kehrlein-Brady.

Emil Kerhlein, Jr., of the Kinema, Fresno, Cal., is a big late getting back at Bill Brady, but it's clever enough to run:

To Honorable editor "Advertising for "Exhibitors" of moving Picture world News who are good doctor for how to run american and Japanese pictures.

honorable Dearest Sir:—

My cousin Kogi approach me of lately and say with utterance, "Nogo," he dilate, with wonder eyebrows, "Have you perused with optics article of "Why I Went Into Moving Pictures" in Sat eve Post News. Honorable King Bray-dy is kindness and life saver."

"I am acquaintance of outburst in Sat Eve Post news," I snapper, with fire on eye brow. "It are submarine dagger of falsehood."

"Not is", dib Kogi, "Hon. Bray-dy is true Samurai, who are to save motion picture industry from ruins."

"How is, "I holla with firely voice. "Who are this Unhon. Bray-dy—what have he done for good Japanese pictures. Nothing," I holla more firely than even 1st time.

"You talk duncely", snigger Kogi. "Hon. Bray-dy want job as General of moving picture steamship waht of lately did sink theatrical hot air ship. Thusly, if Hon. Bray-dy are made general, he will hold rudder and keep bow-sprirts from top rocks."

"And, you talk garbage," I resist. "Unhon. Bray-dy will imbibe eye-strain looking for most hard and sharply razor rocks." But, Kogi make apparition of deafness on both sides of hair. So, muchly and more muchly, my throat holla, and I brawl with loud clamor:

"Are not two (2) dolla seats worth much morely to Unhon. Bray-dy than ten (10) cent seat—supports in Japanese picture theaters. Ah ha!" I holla, with victorious eyebrows, "are it not as clear as sunbeams to your face, than Unhon. Bray-dy are on sharpened lookout through periscope for nice submarine to shoot warfare at moving picture steamship?"

Kogi stagger somewhat at this redoubt, but approach back with triumphant slit in eye, thusly: "Ah! but are not Hon. Bray-dy to donate 150 play stories to Japanese picture business? This are not submarine atrocity. It are generosity."

"Well, perhapsly not for 150,000$," I dally back, "but what are these 150 play stories?"

"The Sat. eve Post News," wail gloriously Kogi, "say that plays is like pork and beans, pants and vests, boots and shoes, butter and ——

"Cheese," I snagger backwardly with my most hottest sneer. At this Kogi collapse.

"Japanese theaters is not charmed with cheeses," Kogi redib with sheeply eyebrow. But, he hold on tight like flies to a fly-paper and request thirstily for knowledge. "Are it not so that Lubin, General Film and Universal are growing picture plays in five pieces instead of one piece."

"Undoubtlessly, it are not so," I snitch. Glows of understanding now appear in Kogi's eye-sockets.

"Perhapsly then," he require, "there WERE good writers with pens and books for Japanese picture theaters backwardly eighteen (18) months ago."

"Surely so, there was," I snizzle back.

"Then perhapsly too, it are theatrical mens' faultiness that theater steamer is sink" he redound with hind-sight.

"Undoubtlessly, it are faultlessly sunk", I swagger criss-crossly to Kogi, who criss-cross back:

"Nogi," he dib, "are Alice Brady, Ethel Barrymore, Charles Hawtrey and Leslie Carter the greatest motioning starlights on the screen?"

"That depends on the size of the Ad," I explode mysterly.

"Well, how are it then, that the vogue of the old motion picture actor is gone" he snuggest.

"Ask the fifteen million personalities who jump into the picture theaters every day and night times," I snig out gladsomely.

"Who killed the geese and the gilt egg?" he redib, this time with tearless eye.

"Read with spy-glass in sat. Eve Post news" I compound back. This are to bottomless retort for Kogi.

"Well, then, Nogi," he criss-cross over, "what are all this picture artickle about in sat Eve Post news?"

"It are a AD, a good AD," I define most painlessly.

"But, an AD for what," squib Kogi, "are it an AD for pork or beans or butter or——

"Cheese", I crackle back, "and, it are not needful for spy-glasses this time." And, I holla loudly and crackfully at my simpless cousin's bewilderness.

Hoping you are the same as you were before,

Yours truthfully,

Nogi Ontohim.

And "Unhon. Bray-dy" announces that he is presently going to get back at his opponents, presumably in the Satevepost while the Universal and Mutual are paying line rates in the same paper for advertising less valuable.

Past Performances.

It is a good thing for the house when the manager can turn to past programs as a reason why you should come next week. He does not merely tell you he has a good offering, he tells you that his statement is backed up by what he has already done and reminds you of the good things he has handed out. Proctor's Broad Street theater, Elizabeth, is running this sort of talk on the back page of the present four-page folder and doing it very well. One paragraph will suffice to give the idea. The stuff is best if regularly used every week, for the sake of cumulative effect:

> The show we announced last week was a corker, wasn't it? Lew Fields in "Old Dutch" broke all records for laughs and then some, and the rest of the program is right there. Well, the program we are announcing for the week of the 22d is even better in some ways, and altogether different. For variety you will have to go far to beat it; for originality it stands in a class by itself, and in merit it's just the best ever. But look again at the layout on the two inside pictures and memorize the dates—you don't want to miss one of the attractions booked.

Perambulating Paper.

From New Orleans comes this picture of a float for "The Life of Our Savior" put out by Josiah Pearce and Sons for the Tudor theater. This is probably all right for New Orleans, but we are inclined to think that in many cities the subject would hardly lend itself to perambulating advertising. In New Orleans, where religious processions are not uncommon, the parade of this twenty-eight sheet will be accepted as a matter of course, but where there is a small Latin population it is better to make appeal through other channels.

For the benefit of next year, suppose you tell what you did, and how you did it, in connection with Holy Week.

Different.

Most advertising post cards when done in imitation of handwriting are still advertisements. The New Grand, Duluth, Minn., sends in a postcard for the "Hazards of Helen." The face shows Miss Holmes and an announcement. On the back is done in script:

> Dear Friend:
> Don't miss the Helen Holmes railroad stories at the Grand each Thurs., Fri. & Sat. & Sun. They are great. Always a fine vaudeville show, too. Best regards. I. P.

The "kicker" is that the card is addressed in the same handwriting, that at first glance it appears really to be a personal message and not merely an advertisement. The first "&" in the copy is crossed off as though the writer had made and corrected a mistake, something that, taken with a tiny x instead of a period, the illusion is further heightened. A strictly black carbon ink should have been used to make the illusion practically perfect, but as it stands the card is lifted out of the commonplace class merely by thought and hard work.

In Combination.

Taking two well-known ideas and combining them, J. W. Bowker, of the Pastime theater, Tuscumbia, Alabama, evolves the D. K. vest pocket program. He has his stock printed up. Some he uses in the house. The rest are punched at the top and threaded, forming a door knob issue as well. Funny no one thought of just this form before, but it is useful and clever. We wish Mr. Bowker would reset his front to get just a little more space between his house panel and the ads top and bottom. They run together too closely. Another pica top and bottom would make all the difference in the world in the display. He now uses this copy:

Vest pocket and
D. K.
Program,
Pastime
Theater,
Tuscumbia, Ala.
Program for Week
March 29 to April 3.

Since he states at the top it is a program, it is not necessary to run the line again at the bottom. It is not necessary to explain it is a D. K. By cutting out "and D. K." at the top and "program for week" at the bottom he can get his space and more, and still have an ample announcement. Apart from this the typographical work is well done. Effective employment is made of the little-used Comstock. A little goes a long ways, but if you want to pull up a few lines with a low point or get big display in larger sizes, this works very well indeed. And here is one printer who realizes that "theater" is not so important as the name of the house and so gets it in a slightly smaller size. That makes two intelligent printers we know of in Alabama. The other one is in Sylacauga.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

INQUIRIES.

Questions concerning photoplay writing addressed to this department will be replied to by mail if a fully addressed and stamped envelope accompanies the letter, which should be addressed to this department. Questions should be stated clearly and should be typewritten or written with pen and ink. Under no circumstances will manuscripts or synopses be criticized, whether or not a fee is sent therefor.

A list of companies will be sent if the request is made to the paper direct and not to this department, and a return stamped envelope is enclosed.

Amateur Authors.

REPLYING to a request for information as to what companies would consider material from "amateur authors," we told the man that there was no such thing as an "amateur author," and there is not. There are authors and persons who wish to become authors, but there cannot, in the nature of things, be amateur authors, consequently no company wants the work of amateur authors.

When a writer reaches the point that he can sell what he writes, he ceases to be an amateur and becomes a professional writer. Until then he is a novice, but not an author, for were he an author he would be able to write and if he is able to write he is no longer an amateur.

A thorough appreciation of this fact will take the sting out of a lot of rejections. A more thorough appreciation of the same fact will enable the beginner to avoid these depressing rejections.

Why should a manufacturer of films seek the unfinished work of the beginner? Why should he purchase the half-baked product of some raw student when for the same money or comparatively little more he can get a professional grade of work. True he advertises that he wants ideas more than he does complete plays, but this does not mean that he wants the rot that the beginner turns out in the mistaken belief that he is writing plays instead of doing experimental work.

If the beginner will start in to work along the proper lines with the full realization that photoplay writing is not a simple, easily acquired art but a regular profession, to be studied and MASTERED before success can come, we would have vastly fewer yawps from the disgruntled. But the man who starts in with the determination that he will first learn to write and then try to sell is the thousandth man. The other 999 work more along these lines.

He sees advertisements in the papers that anyone can write photoplays.

He writes a few and sends them out. What he has written is merely a skeleton narrative, but he thinks it is a play and a better play than he ever saw on the screen.

He keeps on doing this until some editor sends a story back with the statement that it is "not in scenario form." This is usually his first hint that there is some special form in which photoplays should be written, so perhaps he needs a school course, after all. Perhaps this is the reason—it must be the reason—why his excellent plays have been returned.

He becomes a school pupil. To his delight his first work is highly praised and he is urged to send two more dollars for the next batch of lessons. He does so, and his wonderful progress continues. By the time he has completed his course and is graduated, he knows that he must be good because Professor Bunko has told him so. Now there will be no further trouble.

He does over his old stuff into proper form. Strange to say it all comes back the same as ever. Perhaps he sees the story on the screen. It may have been made by a company other than the ones to which the story has been sent, but of course he knows that they all hang together and that the Vitagraph makes the stories that Thanhouser steals and gives Victor the products of Vitagraph's own thefts to divert suspicion. The entire business is leagued against him. He knows his stories are better than the ones he sees on the screen and he knows they are original because he thought of them himself. The inference is obvious. He will quit the company of such bandits.

He cannot know that the story that Vitagraph made that is so like his own may have been done from an old film because there was a rush demand. He cannot know that perhaps a hundred other versions of the story exist, some of them five and six years old. He knows only that he thought out, all by himself, the clever idea of the little child who keeps her parents from separation, and that this idea was stolen and sold to another studio.

But if he does not quit then he falls for the "old reliable" revisionist, or the Literary Bureau, or the sales bureau or the fake League or Association or Clan or Tribe, and each time it is from two to five dollars or even more and each time he is "kidded" along while his money and patience last. And all the time he knows he is an author and all the time he is running along on those ten or a dozen scripts that he wrote before he fell for the school, because there is no use writing more until he sells these. He is not an amateur and he is not an author. He is a credulous ass, envious of the success of others, ever seeking for the short cut to success and never willing to take the advice that he work and study. He has worked and he has studied. He completed his studies with Professor Bunck and Bunck himself wrote that he was good.

Eventually he goes out of business, still with those ten or twelve scripts and still with the fixed belief that film makers and editors are liars, fools and thieves and that successful authors are spit-licking trucklers who sell through pull and influence and not through ability.

That is the "amateur author," if there can be such a thing. Now look on the novice. He first should find out whether he can plot. If he can, he gets books on plotting and on the technique of photoplay writing, not one book, but two or three. If he knows what is what, he first gets the books from the library, looks at all on hand and then, and not until then, decides on what he wants to purchase for desk use. He knows that he will need to own a couple because he will know that they are text books to be studied and absorbed and not merely to be read through once or twice.

Now he will get to work. He will divide his time between study of plotting, study of technique and study of the screen. He will study plotting because he will know that without a plot technique is nothing. He will study technique because he will know that only through proper technique can he convey his thought clearly to the director. He will study the screen, for without a knowledge of effects and how they are gained, he will not know how to plan and gain he effects his stories need.

He will give two-thirds of his study time to plots. He will study the stories of all the films in the trade papers. He will mentally decide what is good and what is bad. He will not be disappointed in his own plots nor will he become unduly proud of them. He will know that at first he cannot hope to compete with the more experienced and he will know that the more practice work he does himself the more experienced will he become. He will not try to sell at once. He will know better. He will know that his work must come into competition with the best work of writers of long training and that it will not compare favorably with this product, so he will keep out of the studios until such a time as he feels that he can offer an occasional story with a reasonable chance for success.

In the course of time he will cease to be a novice and he will become an author, but to his dying day he will remain a student because he will know that he will need to keep studying to keep up with the gradual improvement.

The stories that would sell four years ago are being turned back now because there are so many better stories. The stuff that sells today will find no market whatever in 1920.

Be a student always, be an author as soon as you can, but don't be an illuminated ass.

Suspense in Comedy.

That suspense is as successful and as necessary in comedy as in drama was shown in a recent Keystone. It had the usual Keystone coarseness but in one scene Charles Conklin is balanced on the edge of an open trap in the theater. It totters to the edge and back, he walks around it and over it, he stumbles over it and jumps over it. He does everything but fall through, and it was all laughter. Had he fallen through, as he did later, there would be but a single laugh. On the same bill Charles Chaplin, in an Essanay, fell over a limb of a tree with a girl. Then he fell over again and a couple of more times, then another character came in and fell over and another man did the same thing, each time to a decreasing laugh. The audience was tired of the repetition. But if Chaplin had almost fallen over backward, just as many times and perhaps once or twice more, the laughter would have been crescendo with each avoidance of disaster. It is not always what happens that is funniest in comedy. Sometimes it is what might happen and does not.

Two Letters.

It is not often that we print comment on Technique of Photoplay, but two letters in the same mail are so widely at variance that we take the liberty of quoting from them. One is from a man who saw one of our pictures on the screen and who writes as though it had wrecked his whole life. He says in part:

> It is useless for any amateur to try to compete against tommyrot of this brand. I doubt whether the mental faculties of any amateur are so shop worn as to enable him to get down to it.
> I have also read your book, "Technique of the Photoplay," but, being a Scotchman, I borrowed it. I thereby saved two dollars, because practically and theoretically I found it to be of no use whatever.

And yet in the same mail Miss Elaine Sterne writes:

> I suppose I must receive from two to six letters a day asking how to write photoplays, and my answer to the host of inquiries has invariably been "Buy Epes Winthrop Sargent's text book, The Technique of the Photoplay." It is the finest and most concise work of its kind obtainable.

We wonder which is right.

Heart Interest.

"The editor says he wants heart interest," wails a correspondent. "And I gave it to him the first time. I married off three couples—all I had in the story. Does he expect me to go out and find a wife for the dog?" And the funny part is that there was no more heart interest to the story than there is to a can of beans. Love affairs, perhaps, for he worked the three marriages with the cold professionalism of a bigamist marrying his sixteenth wife, but heart interest and love interest, even where the love affair is made interesting, are wholly different things.

Heart interest is the appeal to the kindly emotions, not the appeal to love of romance. All the world loves a lover, perhaps, but better still is the appeal that warms the heart, that elevates the soul, and this may be done in many ways other than by having Bill want to marry Bess only her father objects. The heart interest in "Shore Acres" was not in the touch of romance but in the kindly hearted old light keeper. He was the central figure, the basis of the heart interest.

In "East Lynne," to go still further back, the heart interest lay in mother love rather than in the marital troubles of the heroine.

Heart interest is tricky and requires a deft and certain touch, but once this touch is gained it will sell stories faster even than sensation will. But it must be heart interest and not bathos. Lately a story was released. The central characters were four young persons, two girls and two brothers. One graceless young scamp had brought one girl to a condition where only an immediate marriage would save her from shame. Then he was killed and the girl's father, discovering the condition of affairs, insisted that the other brother marry her. He was engaged to another girl. The author probably thought he had three heart interest factors, but this is to be questioned. The author thought he saw:

The pathetic figure of the girl who was jilted.

The noble hearted young hero who sacrificed his happiness to shield a woman's honor and his brother's shame.

Another pathetic figure in the young girl who must live an unloved life to provide a paternity for her child.

What the audience saw was something very different, for they argued that two wrongs did not make a right and that of the two girls the innocent should not be made to suffer for the indiscretions of the other. It was not a heart interest story, but a mechanical effort to transmute dross into gold that met the fate of all alchemy since the beginning of time.

Had the noble hearted hero been unattached, then his sacrifice would have been of himself alone. Had he married the girl, not because she needed a father for her child but because she would not accept as charity the support that would have been her due as his brother's widow, then, with adroit handling, the story might have been made into heart interest, but a needless sacrifice to a false sense of duty at the expense of another is not heart interest.

We can feel no heart interest in the mother who neglects her child until the little one dies and then is overcome by remorse. That is not heart interest; it is hysteria. But if she comes to know what the little one feels. If she accidentally overlooks a scene in which the child envies the poor little girl with a loving mother. If she realizes that she has something to give the child that was more than pretty dresses and costly furs, then we should have the foundation for heart interest and it would not be necessary to kill the kiddie to get it.

Heart interest is not maudlin, conventional sentiment. It is a real grip on the innermost feelings.

Balboa Fives.

The more recent offers of the Balboa company are for for five dollars "for the idea," instead of the former flat dollar a reel. Unless you write stuff that is worth no more than five dollars it will be well not to submit to them.

Another Contest Sting.

Only lately we recorded that the Dramatic Mirror passed the names of its Edison ending contestants over to a "Bureau." Now comes a letter from the Conness-Till Company of Toronto. They ran a contest and the contestants were told that they had not won and adding:

> A number of the scenarios had good ideas, but the writers' knowledge of scenarios was so vague that it would entail too much work on our director to get same in shape for proper production. Knowing the difficulty we would have in this respect, we have allowed an excellent school to affiliate with us. We feel, by taking instruction in this school, a number of writers will be able, in a very short time, to submit scenarios we can purchase. We respectfully suggest, if you care to continue writing scenarios, that you get in touch with the school. We are enclosing one of their pamphlets.

Thus is the contest given a new horror. You not only waste your time and energy and tie up your script for several months, but the best you get is an invitation to be a boob!

Filing Material.

S. Walter Bunting, who is one of the veterans of photoplay, though he has not been very active the past year, writes:

> I read your department in the magazine each week, even if you don't hear from me. And I usually find something worth reading. Glad to see you hammer plot so consistently. We all need it. Some of our friends in the editorial departments not the least of all.
> But there is one feature that I don't think you have laid much stress upon as yet. That is the gathering of material. Don't think I am trying to give lessons to the man that bought my first story, you probably had a system for listing your material before, I won't say before I was born, but before I ever thought of entering the game. Nevertheless here's my own; I'm a little proud of it.
> I carry a loose leaf note book with pages 3 x 5, the stock size of an index file. With the exception of two places at the front every page is blank. I get my ideas from the screen, from incidents in real life, from books I read, newspapers, song titles, anywhere at all. That is I get the sugestions. Whenever an idea occurs to me I write it on one of the pages of the loose leaf book. When at my desk I give that page a number and file it in a card index where that number would come. I list it in the front page of my note book briefly so that the front page will hold twenty-five ideas. Whenever I have an opportunity to write I glance over these front pages, select my idea (on occasion several of them go into one story) and on this page I find the number of the idea so that I can get at the more ample note in the index. If I work this idea only partially before leaving it I file everything that I have done in regard to it in an envelope bearing the number of the idea. I may then get it out at some future time or I may work at something else that runs more smoothly for the time and return to the other idea when the fancy strikes me.

To most persons a note book is a necessity. Personally our newspaper training serves in lieu of a note book, but most persons find it better to put the material in a card catalogue or note book, the catalogue scheme being by far the better.

It is not sufficient to note plots as such. Note the factors of plots, situations, motives, bits of effective business, anything that makes for a better story. This does not mean seeing a situation in a theater and writing it down. That is stealing. It means seeing a sitaution and then seeing how much better it would have been had it been handled in another fashion. That is what you want to put down.

You should profit by the mistakes of others rather than their successes. Bits of business constantly present themselves. You see something that strikes you as funny. It does not suggest a plot, but it may later fit into a plot.

Another correspondent asks for a scheme of classification. Perhaps Mr. Bunting and others will contribute the list of their classifications. This might do. Dramatic plots. Comedy plots. Farcical plots. Comedy situations, Dramatic situations, Farcical situations. And the same with business, titles, characterizations, make-ups, locations and leaders.

Saving up a leader might seem like preserving a bung hole, but now and then a leader will suggest itself that reads so well it may be used later.

Send along your classifications. The above is crude. Perhaps you have something better.

Comes Mr. Chandlee.

Comes Harry Chandlee to traverse a few remarks recently made in this department by a writer whose name was not given. Mr. Chandlee, who is one of Lawrence McClosky's Lubin staff, writes:

> It's been a long time since I burst into song, but he of the suppressed name in the March 13th World causes me to peep thus:
> He says he saw the story, "The Man from the Sea," one of Long George Terwilliger's, in which Kemp Green, drowned, sends word to Earle Metcalf that he'll show up on his wedding day and take the girl, all of which he does. Suppressed Name says he'll stick to logical plots like this in future.
>
> Now, the trouble is that S. N. has missed the idea of "logicality" in plots. Tell him to read the story in the S. E. P. by Melville Davisson Post, a week or so ago, called "The Mystery Story." It gives more real dope on plots than anything that has appeared lately. Post says that it is better to use a "probable impossibility" than an "improbable possibility." Now, it would, of course, be impossible for a dead man to come back for the girl he loves, but if it were possible, it is very probable that he would. Therefore, all we have to do is to admit the supernatural and we have a logical story. Nothing else in the plot is illogical. It all fits together. The play is frankly a supernatural one, and from this standpoint there is nothing wrong with it.
> Now for the improbable possibility. Post gives as an example the idea of the King of England playing a flute in Trafalgar Square. This is entirely possible, but it's hard to conceive of circumstances under which the kink would do it. Here's my example: Girl is held prisoner in a house by thugs. Man knows it, and starts for rescue. The thing happens in the city and the place is full of cops, yet he goes alone, instead of getting help. He gets caught and confined in the same room with the girl. He chews the knots of her bonds, frees her, and she escapes and rides on a convenient motorcycle for the police, getting back just in time to save Archibald's life. You see, Archie couldn't bring the police because, if he did, he wouldn't get a chance to chew knots, nor would the girl have the pleasant little spin on the motorcycle, and those things supply the action for the picture. All this is possible, but is highly improbable. The first thing Amorous Art would do would be to call the police. But he couldn't because he'd kill the story. Now, it would have been easy for the writer to have fixed it and had Artie caught without knowing that Madge was in the place, but he didn't do it. Hence, an illogical story.
> Personally, I think Suppressed Name is a little sore and doesn't mean what he says.

Personally we think that the gentleman of the suppressed name was sore and with some basis of reason, but that is beside the point, and at any rate Mr. Chandlee brings out a good point in his amendment to the Satevepost story. Too many tales are written from an improbability that could not exist in real life if people acted sanely. A ghost in "The Man from the Sea" is far less irritating than a more possible but utterly idiotic affair.

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT IS AN established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until the excellence of such articles has been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply throught the department in less than two or three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending four cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department, one dollar.

Both the first and second set of questions are now ready and printed in neat booklet form, the second half being seventy-six in number. Either booklet may be had by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor or both for 40 cents. Cannot use Canadian stamps. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy of these questions. You may be surprised at the number you cannot answer without a lot of study.

Question No. 82.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Tell us what care you would give your rheostat connections. Illustrate, by sketch, the arrangement of the insulation in a grid rheostat. Suppose a grid broke in the only rheostat you had, how would you make a quick, temporary repair?

Roll of Honor on Question No. 76.

The Roll of Honor on Question No. 76 consists of Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; Montreal, Canada; John Solar, Watertown, New York; A. C. Stewart, Pendleton, Oregon; Frank Williard, Jr., Marshalltown, Iowa; B. M. Spencer, Attleboro, Massachusetts, and Texas.

I have selected the reply of Texas as best suited for publication.

Reply to Question No. 76.

The Question:

What gauge is used when measuring resistance wire? What difference is there, both mechanical and electrical, when using a rheostat on D.C. and on A.C.? Explain fully. With a given voltage will a rheostat deliver more current when working on A.C. or D.C.? Suppose there be no arc, but that the rheostat be connected directly between the wires. Would it then deliver more current on A.C. or D.C.? Explain fully.

The Answer:

The American Standard wire gauge, commonly termed the B. & S. (Browne & Sharpe) is the gauge ordinarly used to measure resistance wires in this country. They may, of course, be measured with any other gauge, such as the Old English, London, Birmingham, Stubs, etc., but the B. & S. is standard for the Good Old U. S. A. I enclose a table showing the difference between the various wire gauges. The difference when using resistance on A.C or D.C. consists in (a) rheostat will deliver more current on A.C. than on D.C. because of the fact that the A.C. arc is shorter than the D.C. arc, hence is of lower voltage. It therefore has less resistance, hence the total resistance interposed is less with A.C. than D.C. when the same rheostat is used for both; (b) where a wire coil rheostat is used on A.C., there will be a certain amount of inductive resistance, due to the coils in the rheostat acting a good deal the same as would weak choke coil. In fact if you inserted a bundle of iron wire, covered with insulating material, in the center of a rheostat coil you would have a choke coil. I don't know that the effect of this inductive resistance has ever been measured, and in any event it would vary with the closeness of the spirals of the coil. With the coils fairly well stretched the particular effect is not of any considerable amount. On a grid rheostat this choking effect amounts to very little; otherwise the electrical effect of the wire and grid is identical both on A.C. and D.C.

Mechanically the difference lies in the fact that when wire coil rheostats are used on A.C. the inductive effect is likely to set up considerable vibration in the coils, which creates noise; also there might be some effect on the metal lining of the operating room if the aforesaid lining was thin and the rheostat coils set very close to it. With a grid rheostat no appreciable vibration would be set up by A.C., either in the grids themselves or in any surrounding object. Still another electro-mechanical effect is, where a wire coil rheostat is used for a considerable time on A.C., the vibration of the coils is likely to crystallize the metal of the wires, and this crystallization, in my opinion, adds somewhat to the resistance, and constitutes, in effect, a deterioration of the wire. With a given voltage a rheostat will deliver more current on A.C. than on D.C. for reasons already explained. If it were connected directly between the lines without any A.C. interposed, the same rheostat would deliver slightly less current on A.C. than on D.C., due to the aforesaid inductive effect, which would be greater in the wire coil than in a grid rheostat. In fact I am not sure it would effect the result in a grid rheostat at all. In any event a rheostat so connected would deliver considerable more current than it would when working in series with an arc, because of the fact that the resistance of the arc is entirely eliminated. The effect would be to overload the rheostat. Another mechanical difference between the grid and wire coil rheostat is that the grids are held together with one or two long heavy bolts, which is superior in every way to the method of joining the wire coils.

(I have not included the gauge comparison table, because the American or B. & S. is the standard in this country, and is, so far as I know, the only one used in the United States, therefore the table would be of no particular value, and it can be found in any standard electrical text book, should any one desire to consult it.—Ed.)

A Toronto Operating Room.

Mr. Burt Gordon, manager of the Photodrome Theater, sends in the accompanying photograph of the operating room of his house. Projection is in charge of Harry T. Dobson, who is industriously demonstrating the balminess of the Toronto winter by sporting a summer negligee costume, assisted by Brother W. L. Johnston, who is more cold-blooded and wears a vest. It will also be observed that both Brothers Dobson and Johnston have a tight grip on the bank roll; evidence they are suspicious of each other.

In the photograph, 1 is the union card of rules, 2-2 the fuse boxes, 3 port hole shutter, 4-4-4 cords holding the port shutters. These cords are bad; very bad. Individual shutter cords should always attach to a master-cord holding all of them, and the master-cord should have a fuse link of celluloid immediately over and not more than five or six inches distance from the upper magazine.

I like that card "Have a place for everything and everything in its place." It is needed in all too many operating rooms. I don't see any signs of a vent flue, though possibly there is one, and if there is not there should be.

Up Against It.

A. W. Hornby, Port Hope, Ontario, Canada, says:

> For the first time in five years of operating I am up against it. Can you tell me how to get rid of a double spot at the cooling plate? I also get an image of my carbons on the screen. Am using a 5-inch e. f. objective; picture 11 feet 2 inches; distance of projection 60 feet; two 7½ condensers. I have already tried: moving the lamp at different distances from the lens; different setting of carbons; have tried another objective and other condensers. Machine is a Power's 6A. What amperage should I have on a cotton screen coated with alabastine?

Now here is a good brother who sends in a lot of data but does not say a word about whether the current is A. C. or D. C., though presumably from the double spot it is A. C. That double spot I have found to be one of the hardest propositions I ever encountered. If you are using A. C. try giving your lamp more angle; perhaps that may help. Also be very sure that your condensing lenses are (a) one not higher than the other; (b) that the plano faces set square with each other, and that the whole optical system of the projector is in line. See pages 227 and 228 of the Handbook. If you are using A. C. 60 amperes would not be any too much even on that small a picture. If you are using D. C. 35 amperes ought to give you a very good illumination. Of course it all depends on the individual idea of how bright a picture should be. On page 335 of the Handbook you will find a table suggesting the amperage to be used per square foot of screen. For 169 feet (about what you have) it recommends 33 amperes D. C. and 50 A. C. Of course that would depend a good deal on the surface, and yours is not of the most effective type. I think this is about all the information I can give you with the data at hand.

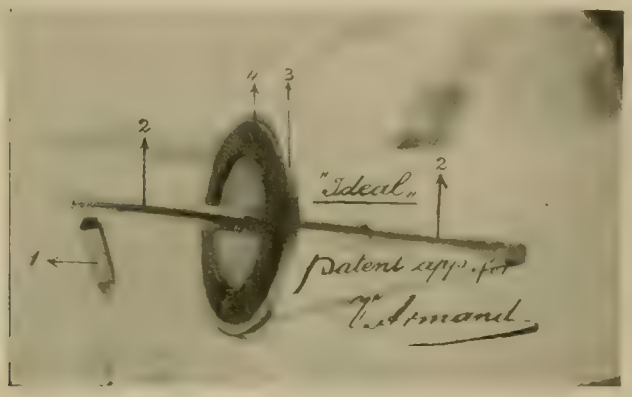
The "Ideal" Take-Up.

V. Armand, Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada, sends sample of a take-up device which he has invented, and named the "Ideal."



At first glance I was of the opinion that this particular device had little or no value. Brother Armand, however, insisted that I give it a try-out, which was done, and, much to my surprise, the reports were favorable. The take-up not only worked, but it worked very well indeed, and it has extreme simplicity in its favor. I think there is no doubt that this little device is considerably better than the regular friction take-up in use at present on practically all the standard machines. It consists of merely shaft 2 carrying cast iron disc 3 in groove 4, in which is inserted a leather washer. Dog 1 holds the reel over against this washer, and the washer supplies the driving force of the wheel. There is nothing outside the magazine except belt pully 6, and, of course, the end of shaft 2. I had thought that even if the take-up worked all right on good reels it would not on crooked ones, but this it seems was not the fact, as a bent reel works just as well as a straight one. Taking everything into consideration, I am glad to give Brother Armand's take-up the approval and endorsement of this department. Prices, etc., will be found in his advertisement on another page.

Picture Overlapping Border.

Raymond Robbins, Harlem, Montana, renews his suoscription and says:

> Am especially interested in the projection department, as I am an operator, and the more I read it the more I learn about my profession. I have the Handbook, and in my opinion no operating room should be without one. When you say the book covers everything in the business you have it classed properly, and the clear and simple way in which it is written is surely a credit to its author. One thing I would like to ask is this: why, when you paint the black border around the picture, as advised in the Handbook, do you suggest extending the black in so that the picture overlaps on it? I have made several screens and like the border very much, but I always paint it the exact size and shape of the picture and found it to work fine.

The reason for having the picture overlap on the black by an inch or an inch and a half is that if the black is perfectly dead (no gloss) that part of the picture on the black is not seen by the audience, and the result is that any vibration of the aperture itself is effectually hidden. In other words, unless the projection machine is absolutely rock steady (a condition seldom or never accomplished) the effect of the overlap is to help steady the picture. I also believe it has the effect of reducing the visible effect of the unsteadiness of the picture itself, though that would be purely an optical illusion, and open to argument. Many thanks for your kind words concerning the book and department.

Motor Drive.

A. C. Hall, Louisburg, North Carolina, asks:

> Is it advisable to put a motor on a machine where there is only one used? If so why, and if not why? We have a Powers Six A which has been in use nearly a year. Sometimes the titles look as though the screen were moving back and forth. The picture is in focus all the time. There is no travel ghost and the shutter seems to be set right, but there is a little flicker at times. We take current through a Fort Wayne compensarc, run six hours a day, and sometimes the compensarc gets rather warm. What is the best method of cooling it? Why does the machine run harder sometimes than at other times?
> Certainly you can put a motor on a single machine. Why not? It will relieve you of the drudgery of turning the crank. The only danger is that you may form the habit of letting it relieve you entirely and, instead of sitting there and watching your projection every minute of the time, you will be moving around the operating room, glancing at the picture once in a while, and that will spell mediocre, if not poor projection. As to the effect in the writing matter, why the way you have described it I can make nothing of it. Most likely the effect is also present in the picture but is not so noticeable. I think probably your film is buckling slightly over the aperture, due possibly to worn aperture plate tracks. See General Instructions No. 9 and 11, pages 216 and 217 of the Handbook. Possibly the variation in flicker is due to an unconscious variation in speed. The slower you run the machine the more flicker there will be. It is also possible your voltage varies, and therefore the light will be brighter at one time than at others, and the brighter the light the greater the tendency to flicker. Get a thermometer and take the temperature of the room and then place it inside the compensarc against the coils. If it shows more than 70 degrees increase in temperature there is probably something wrong, but it is nothing you can fix yourself; you will have to send the compensarc to the factory. I don't think there is anything the matter though. Possibly your voltage is a little high, with consequent slight overload. The only way you can keep the temperature down is to set a small fan in such position that it will blow a blast of air over the compensarc. Cannot tell you why the projector runs harder at times than at others. There ought not to be anything of that kind. You will have to describe the matter a little more in detail if I am to give you an intelligent answer.

Lacks the "Where-With."

W. H. Shephard, Davenport, Washington, says:

> Brother Sweeney's idea is all right, but he is hooked up wrong, and it won't be long before his differential gears will be on the blink. I would suggest that he take off both rear tires and run a belt from each rear wheel to a line shaft, from which one belt can drive the dynamo. We have very good projection here. The manager recently installed a motor generator set which is slightly different from some. A motor drives the dynamo by belt. He is changing to a gasoline engine taken out of an auto, for the reason that it costs nearly the same to run the motor as it did to furnish the machine with A. C., and he figures he can run the engine cheaper than he can the motor. I also noticed, same issue, where the Hon. T. E. Anderson poured out his vials of wrath. He should come out here and spring that line of talk. Operators would very quickly attend to his case in a way he would not like. L. F. Wallace's dope, February 13th issue, is just what I like to see. The only reason I did not " go and do likewise" last year was lack of the wherewith. I believe Friend Wallace is worthy of emulation, and I would not mind working with an outfit like that for a season or two.

All of which I think requires no comment from Yours Truly, except to say that the automobile stunt has already been pretty thoroughly dealt with.

Floor Drop.

W. T. Smith, Attleboro, Massachusetts, orders a Handbook and says:

> We look upon you as our encyclopedia, therefore the following question: What is the proper drop in the auditorium floor of a moving picture theater? I take it the angle of drop is a fixed ratio, regardless of the length of the hall, so that the rise is gradual.

You are correct. The more drop the floor has the better, provided it be not steep enough to require steps in the aisle, remembering, however, that if you get too much slope the seats themselves will have to be set on steps, else they will lean forward too much. I think you will find one foot in ten, or one foot in twelve ample, and, everything considered, most satisfactory. For myself I would, I think, prefer one foot in ten if the hall is a tolerably long one. Where the picture sets up pretty well from the floor, and the hall is a short one not so much rise is necessary, and one in twelve would be plenty.

Film in Wretched Condition.

W. C. Evans, Atoka, Oklahoma, encloses some film samples which are in terrible condition. In one piece the sprocket holes are ripped off one side for eighteen inches and there are several very bad splices. Brother Evans says:

> Just got a set of Hawkins' Electrical Guide and they are fine, as is also the projection department. I am sending samples cut from our program yesterday, or rather from one reel of it. Recently I wrote our exchange complaining about getting the films in such wretched condition. A few days ago I received a letter from an operator on our circuit reading like this: "I have been an operator almost two years and a member of the Muskogee I. A. T. S. E. Local, and I think I know how to handle films." Well, if he sends them away in the conditions indicated by the samples I do not know if he is entitled to be hailed by the title "operator" or not. Personally, I should say not.

I cannot, of course, say much about the Muskogee local member, as I do not know the facts positively. However, I take it the films are on a circuit, which is bad, to start with. Films should always go back to the exchange for inspection. However, where operators are on a circuit they should have a little consideration for the man who follows them, and have enough personal pride to at least send the films away in something like decent condition. By no stretch of the imagination could the films from which these samples were taken be called in "decent condition." Probably if the man who sent them away in that shape received them in such condition he would put up a howl that would sound like a cross between a steam-calliope and a buzz-saw cutting through a hickory splinter. Away back in the olden days, before the advent of the modern version: "Do the other fellow or he will do you," there was a saying: "Whatsoever ye would that man do unto you, do even so unto him." I quote this old-time motto, called The Golden Rule, not because I expect the modern man to pay any attention to it, but just simply as a curiosity from the olden days, to which your grandfather's father really sometimes gave a little serious consideration—silly old man that he was. When the Muskogee member reads this, I would invite his consideration of the old-time foolish saying just quoted. The two-years-an-operator brother would most emphatically not like to receive films pinned together with pins, with sprocket holes ripped off for a whole foot on one side and patches half pulled in two. Indeed he would not! The difference is, however, he is through with them, therefore "he should worry." Let the next man fix 'em up or—oh well, he should worry? Darn the next fellow who gets 'em. That's no affair of his. And, be it known, the Muskogee member is not the only one who takes this view, and yet swells out his chest and calls himself an operator. God save the mark!

Worn Parts.

F. O. Smith, Millbridge, Maine, writes:

I have been greatly interested in the department for five years past. You certainly are doing a wonderful work towards helping those who are willing to learn. Am having trouble with my Powers Five head. The large gear beside the grooved take-up belt pulley, and the one of equal diameter immediately above it, with which it meshes, does not work right. When my take-up belt is as tight as it should be the gears will not mesh, there is a terrible grinding, and the lower sprocket refuses to revolve. Can you tell me what to do? And now here is a kick against the inspectors of the Bangor branch of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. Attached are two samples of film exactly as I cut them out of the reel when it was received. These two are only a few of many. The service is four to six months, and I am compelled to spend more than an hour on each reel getting them in shape to run. We use gas; project a 12 foot picture, and, for gas, it is a swell light. We run three nights a week, and business is very good.

As to the gears, Brother Smith, I think there is no question but that either the shafts or the bearings are very badly worn. The answer is: get new parts. I do not remember if these bearings are bushed. If they are not then you would probably have to send the machine to the factory for repair. If they are, then new bushings, spindles and gears will fix you. As to the film, it does not show poor inspection—it shows no inspection at all. I have referred the matter to the Universal headquarters, and the Bangor exchange will doubtless hear from them.

Has a Jump.

K. F. Van Norman, Mansfield, Pennsylvania, writes:

There is a decided up and down jump in my picture. I installed a new intermittent sprocket, but it did not seem to help much. Would worn upper or lower sprocket produce such an effect?

No, the upper or lower sprocket has nothing whatever to do with the picture jumping. If your picture jumps up and down four times to every revolution of the crank, either the sprocket itself is out of true, there is something wrong with one of the sprocket teeth, or your intermittent sprocket shaft is sprung, or the intermittent shaft bushings are worn. Be sure there is no gum or dirt collected on the face of the intermittent sprocket.

It Can't Be Did.

Fresno, California, writes at some length concerning the punch-between-the-sprocket-holes injury, which matter has already been settled, and then says:

Am enclosing newspaper clipping relative to an odd job I had the other day. It was sure unique. The feeling of being absolutely surrounded by criminals and murderers, and being locked in with them for a period of more than two hours, is not one soon to be forgotten. Well, Friend Richardson, when are you coming to our Fair? Am sending a book of illustrations to show you what it is, and hoping it may prove an inducement to you to come. If you do, be sure to drop off at Fresno, if only for a few hours. All the boys in Local 599 are anxious to meet you, and I presume the managers are also—at least I know mine, Mr. Kehrlein, is. We would also like you to see the Kinema, as we are very proud of this house. My order is in for a new Westinghouse motor generator, 72 ampere capacity—the same you described in the department some weeks ago.

The book was certainly a beauty. I enjoyed looking it over, and would like to see the reality and meet your boys, but—it cannot be did. It is going to be work, work and then some more work, with me, up to the last of August, this summer, but I think the final result will please you all. The odd job consisted in running pictures in the county jail in which sixty odd prisoners, one facing a life term in the penitentiary, are confined. The noted (or notorious) outlaw, Al Jennings, lectured on the picture.

The Matter Is Local.

E. L. Zimmerman, Springfield, Ohio, orders a Handbook and says:

I would greatly appreciate information as to the right authority to consult concerning construction of a "motion picture theater" to comply with all the requirements of the law.

That, Brother Zimmerman, is wholly and entirely a matter of local laws, except in so far as the Underwriters rules go, and you can get the underwriter requirements by consulting their local representative. There is no national law applying to the construction of theaters. The chief of police of your city can no doubt tell you who to go to in Springfield to get the information you desire.

From New Brunswick.

A. J. Mason, St. John, comes in with the following:

Attached find drawing of an attachment I put on my lamp to enable me to adjust my lower carbons. The shaft is ⅝ of an inch, with universal joint, as shown. The bearing cast iron and is clamped to the shoulder of the lower arm by a screw. By looking at the Simplex lamp you will notice a groove where the rack is pinned to the shoulder of the lower carbon arm. The bearing is made to fit this groove and will thus always be held in position. The drawing is, I think, self-explanatory. Of course the new Simplex lamp has the adjustment in a somewhat different form. However, I have found mine to be of great advantage, and it has been working splendidly for nearly a year. Before adding it to the lamp I was obliged to open the lamphouse door and poke the thumb-screw with a piece of wood, or something else to move the carbon back or ahead, and even then I seldom got it exactly right.

I trust this will be of some benefit to the boys using the old model lamp. I have also invented another device designed to protect the eyes from the spot. Before long I will be able to send you photographs of my generator and operating room. You remember I am taking a 2,200 volt supply, and I haven't got a jolt from it yet. (Yes, and, what is more, you never will get but just one, so you had better be pretty reasonably careful.—Ed.) You may not hear from some of us, but we are with you, and the department, just the same, and are benefiting by your work. Nowadays it takes all our time studying the dope being published on lenses. However, that is the way nine-tenths of us acquire what little knowledge we have—yes, that's the way we all got it. The relief from the worries with which so many of us were afflicted before Richardson started the department is never to be forgotten, at least by those who had to dig and lose sleep as we old-timers did some years ago.

The attachment enables Brother Mason to throw the tip of the lower carbon forward or backward. It is a whole lot better than nothing, but not equal to the straight sliding movement, because of the fact that as the top carbon burns away its relation to the lower tip is altered where the lower carbon is at an angle. Friend Mason is taking a 2,200 volt supply through a motor generator, description of which was published some time ago. As to the eye protector, why the woods are full of eye protector inventions. I think probably that idea first emanated from the distinguished editor of this department, who recommended a green glass protector in the Moving Picture World, something like ix or seven years ago, in a series of articles which afterwards became the first edition of the Handbook. This shield is described and illustrated on page 72 of the first edition of the Handbook. I think right now there are at least twenty-five different eye shields, all of them good, but some better than others, of course. Glad to have the pictures when they are ready.

Send Self-Addressed Stamped Envelope.

George Kraus, Mogollon, New Mexico, says:

I wish you would, through the department, advise exhibitors using calcium gas as an illuminant to enclose self-addressed stamped envelope when writing for information regarding the proper charging and care of the Model B gas machine. Also the use of Guil Pastil. In the issue of December 7, 1912, I explained, in detail, the proper charging and care of the Model B gas machine and also, again, in the department of July 5, 1913. And I set forth, in detail, in the department June 13, 1914, how the Guil Pastil should be used to obtain the best results. This is my fourth year of subscription and I am proud to say I have every copy received to date filed away for future reference. Also a copy of the handbook which ought to be in every operating room.

I would caution correspondents when writing for information to at least send postage. Many of our readers who don't have a large correspondence themselves fail to realize the fact that whereas one two-cent stamp does not amount to much, fifty or a hundred of them does, and certainly when you are asking a man to give his time in helping you with information, the very least you can do is to provide postage.

Size of Picture.

F. A. Stadler, Youngstown, Ohio, says:

What size picture should be shown in a house 68 x 41, rear seats 50 feet from screen? And how much larger than that should the screen be?

If I were you I do not think I would show larger than a 14 foot picture, and would make the screen 16 or 18 feet, and paint the whole screen outside the picture dead black, letting the picture overlap on the black by an inch or two.

Mercury Arc Rectifier.

R. B. Stewart, Brampton, Ontario, Canada, says:

Have had many good hints from the department, particularly in the questions and answers. The Handbook also is a great help. We have a Simplex projector. G. E. mercury arc rectifier, and the best little house in this part of the country, seating 416. Should there be current at my lamp when the rectifier is not in use? I can touch either carbon arm and get a ground standing on the floor. We have one conduit with A. C. leads to rectifier and D. C. to lamp, both in one. Is this proper? I rigged up a double-throw switch and put it on rectifier so I can change my taps to suit supply, which varies in voltage. We have 25 cycle current, at 110 volts—sometimes.

Yes, unless the A. C. supply switch is open there will be voltage at the arc—not current, but voltage. There will only be current after the carbons are closed. The General Electric recommends that a switch be put on the D. C. side, and I heartily approve that recommendation, that is to say, a machine switch which will cut out the lamp. There is, of course, the possibility that the A. C. leads are grounded to the D. C. in the conduit, though it is hardly probable if the rectifier is working all right. However, if I understand you correctly, you have both the D. C. and A. C. in one conduit and that is something I would not advise. Of course, I don't know as there is anything very much wrong with it, since it is practically all one circuit, but, nevertheless, there is always the danger of the A. C. and D. C. grounding to each other, and I would advise a separate conduit for the D. C. Possibly your supply current comes through a transformer, and this transformer is not large enough. Such a condition would aggravate the voltage drop you complain of which is, however, primarily due to overload on the lines if the voltage varies while the theater load is constant.

Elimination of Flicker.

From a certain theater manager in a certain state in the Glorious Land of the supposed-to-be-free comes the following:

I am going to tell you something that will set you thinking. I have been working for several months to see if I could not do away with the flicker on picture machines, and I can truthfully say that I can take any make of projector and do away with not only most of the flicker but all of it, and at the same time increase the light 50 per cent. It would not be expensive to install on any make of machine, and I can take a thousand foot reel of film and run it thirty minutes without any flicker. Would there be any money in such a patent?

You bet your sweet neck there would be; oodles of it. But, my dear sir, I would call that week uneventful when at least one inventive operator or manager did not spring that particular proposition on me. In the more than five years of holding down my present position I guess I have had at least five hundred, and perhaps a thousand men tell me almost exactly the same thing, and I have examined a whole lot of these schemes, only to find them of no real value. Usually it turns out that the inventor had a machine, the shutter of which was not adapted to local conditions, and he did exactly what he ought to do, i. e., made his shutter fit the local conditions, which happened to be such that flicker could be largely reduced by reason of the fact that when he got done the shutter was practically a 50-50 three-wing shutter, which is ideal. Oh, yes, I will be glad to look it over, and if you really have something of value—if, if, IF you have got anything worth while, I will be the first to remove my chapeau and say hooray. But, frankly, my brother, you have got to show me, because of the fact that there are certain fundamental optical laws which I do not believe can be changed or monkeyed with, and unless you can change them I do not think you can eliminate flicker, except that you may reduce it by approaching the ideal 50-50 three-wing shutter, or else do away with the shutter altogether, which latter is—well, my friend, come across with your idea and we will see what you have got.

The Cause for Why.

Of late the editor has been doing a little prowling around film development plants. He has imitated the four-legged animal which goes to supply soapgrease, ham and bacon, by vigorously rooting down under the surface and turning up a few sub rosa facts. He has pried some of these facts loose in places where, had they known his object, they probably would have nailed the aforesaid facts down with twenty-penny spikes and covered them up with seven layers of nice woolen blankets. Well, here is the net result:

There has always been more or less kick about stretched film, and of late these kicks have multiplied. There has always been a certain tendency to out of focus effect or bulging of the film over the aperture which could not be altogether charged to worn sprockets and aperture plate tracks, or tension springs wrongly set. It was the cause for why the editor was after, and he got it, too.

It seems that some of the film manufacturers make no provision whatever for the shrinkage of the film in drying, while other manufacturers make inadequate provision. I have watched a length of film wound on a flat rack which had no adjustments to provide for shrinkage, and had "stuck around" until that film was dry. When the film was wound on the rack it was just a snug fit. It was not tight. When it was dry it was like a fiddle string. In fact by twitching some of the lengths you could, in extreme cases, get a coarse musical tone from the film, and that is the answer to the stretched film proposition. The same thing will apply to film which is dried on drums. Some manufacturers wind their films on a drum varying from four to ten feet in diameter, these drums being made up of slats from two to four and even five inches apart, the aforesaid slats having a rounded face on the outside edge, where it comes into contact with the film. Now these spaces between the slats are supposed to, in part, compensate for the shrinkage, of the film in drying and in addition to this some manufacturers fasten both ends with elastic or a coil spring. But where a long length of film, perhaps 1,000 feet, is wound on a drum it is hardly to be expected it will overcome the friction and slip throughout its entire length. Therefore, the elastic only serves to eliminate the strain on perhaps a hundred feet of film or maybe two hundred

But, as has been said, the distance between the slats is presumed to make up for the shrinkage because the film can stretch straight across between two slats, instead of following the arc of the circle, but right here is an exceedingly pernicious effect, because the film will be flattened out perfectly straight where it comes into contact with the slat, and between the slats it will be cupped. Now producers claim that this does not make any difference, and that, in any event, it disappears in a short time. I dispute this proposition absolutely. The effect may disappear after a long time, but I doubt if it ever entirely leaves the film, and, moreover, at least for a considerable time it is going to require a pretty heavy tension on the projector to overcome the effect of these alternate cupped and straight portions. What is the answer?

Well, I cannot give it in full, but this much I can say. Film should under no circumstances be dried on a flat rack. It should always be dried on a solid drum, that is to say, a drum having its face entirely covered with lumber, dressed down perfectly smooth, with a provision (and that is the point I do not quite understand, though I know it can be done, and has been done) for slightly automatically reducing the diameter of the drum as the film dries. Film wound on such a drum as this will dry absolutely flat, and if the ends be attached to the drum with elastic, and provision be made by splitting the drum so as the film dried the drum can contract slightly, it will not be stretched in any degree.

I would suggest to theater managers who are troubled by unsteady pictures caused through film which has been improperly dried, that they enter a vigorous protest to film producers, calling attention, if necessary, to this article, and demanding that the trouble be eliminated. There is no question but that I have the right dope, because I have gotten it from the heads of the drying rooms of some of the best and oldest film producers in the business. One of these men who has been in the developing and drying rooms for thirteen years, told me this: "Much of the trouble lies in the fact that there have so many producers sprung up of late who do not understand the importance of the small details of handling film, and, moreover many of them are short-sighted, only looking for the dollar they can grasp today or tomorrow, instead of looking ahead into the future, considering the future permanency of the business and bending every energy to eliminate every possible fault in their productions and produce perfect films. It is also a fact that many of these newer producers expend enormous energy in securing really splendid plots, high class actors, magnificent settings, and all that sort of thing, but having done this, seem to think they have performed their whole duty, and pay little or no attention to the smaller, but enormously important details of the developing room."

And there you are, gentlemen. I think there is a lot of truth in the observations this man made, and I believe, moreover, that the whole trouble so far as stretched film, and film that will not lie flat over the aperture is concerned is pretty well summed up in the foregoing.

Won't Stand Still.

Stephen F. Kimball, Alamogordo, New Mexico, writes:

Our Powers Six machine has been run about a year and a half, but only ten or fifteen hours per week. There is very little flicker or ghost but the picture will not "stand still." It is specially noticeable in titles and writing. I believe the trouble is in the intermittent movement, though we cannot locate it. The teeth on the intermittent sprocket were well worn so we put in a new sprocket, but this did not improve matters at all. We are one hundred miles from the nearest "exprt," therefore your advice is peculiarly of advantage.

Let us see, Brother Kimball. You say ten or fifteen hours a week. All right. Suppose we say twelve. 52x12=624 hours a year, or about 925 hours in a year and a half. The intermittent movement, running at normal speed, acts sixteen times a second, or, 16x60=960 times a minute, or, 960x60=57,600 times an hour, therefore in 925 hours it would have acted 53,280,000 times. Don't you think it is time you had a new one? Steel striking on steel under considerable pressure fifty-three and a half million times is bound to wear, and I think in all human probability that is your trouble. I would suggest that you purchase from the Nicholas Power Company an entire framing carriage. This will cost you considerable, true; but then you can send your old carriage in for repairs and always have one in reserve. The next best thing, and the one really to be desired, would be to rent a mechanism from your exchange and send your own, carefully packed, by parcel post or express, to the Nicholas Power Company, 90 Gold street, New York City, for a thorough overhauling. I will request the Nicholas Power Company to correspond with you.

Comments on the Films

General Film Company

THE GAMBLER'S I. O. U. (Biograph), April 12.—An artificial little drama that smacks strongly of the theater and bears but slight relation to life. However, the producer has taken advantage of every opportunity offered by the scenes and situations; Barney Furey, Chas. H. West, Harry Carey and Claire McDowell are equally conscientious with their part of the work.

A NIGHT IN KENTUCKY (Essanay), April 12.—An ultra-chivalrous drama of the South, with the inevitable duel to furnish the big situation, this one-reel offering posesses only a fair amount of merit. Ruth Stonehouse and Albert act the lovers with their accustomed happy result.

ROAD O' STRIFE SERIES No. 1, THE FACE OF FEAR (Lubin) April 12.—Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush on page 568, issue of April 24.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL No. 29, 1915 (Selig), April 12.—Park Row crowd, New York City, watching the reports from the Willard-Johnson fight; parade in honor of Wm. Hale Thompson's election as Mayor of Chicago; racing at Bowie, Md.; Atlantic City crowd on the board walk Easter Sunday; the Fifth avenue Easter parade, and timely war pictures claim attention in the present news film.

MR. JARR'S MAGNETIC FRIEND (The Jarr Family Series, No. 5), (Vitagraph), April 12.—It takes Mr. Jarr's magnetic friend a long time to get started in this edition of the Jarr mishaps, but his finish is electrifying. The last five minutes of the reel compensate for the want of comic incident in the rest of the farce. Harry Davenport still heads the cast.

THE "POLLYWOGS" PICNIC (Kalem), April 13.—A greased pig is an able assistant to "Ham" and "Bud" in keeping the fun going at the picnic; the pie-eating contest is also the source of much merriment. "Ham" and "Bud" make a brave attack on everything in sight, as they strut about in uniform. Charles E. Inglee burlesques General Delivery cleverly.

BLACK ART (Lubin), April 13.—A short-reel farce, patterned after a minstrel afterpiece and played by a colored cast. Not the most humorous production of the Lubin colored players. John and Mattie Edwards, Billie Higgins and David Roseborough work vigorously with the material given them.

CLEANING TIME (Lubin), April 13.—On the same reel with Black Art. A capital satire on the joys of house-cleaning, the fun moving along at a lively pace, thanks to the speedy playing of Babe Hardy and Eva Bell.

MRS. MURPHY'S COOKS (Selig), April 13.—Tom Mix, Louella Maxam and Anna Dodge have the leading roles in this one-reel farce, that raises a gale of laughter by its breezy humor. A real human touch, which underlies the extravagance of the situations, adds to the effectiveness of the fun.

THE COOK'S MISTAKE (Edison), April 14.—A jealous woman, a brace of revolvers, a barrel, tank of water, and a large assortment of male humans as targets for the lady to shoot at, are the ingredients of this one-reel farce, by W. F. Smith. It will be hugely relished by many patrons of the photoplay, and is dished up by Wm. Fables, Thomas Hedden and other able assistants.

THE FABLE OF THE MEN AT THE WOMEN'S CLUB (Essanay), April 14.—George Ade at his funniest. The charge of the men upon the "Life Saving Station" at the meeting of the Woman's Club will strike a responsive chord in the unregenerate soul of the sterner sex. One reel of first-rate aid to the gloomy.

ONE RAINY DAY (Kalem), April 14.—On the same reel with "The Voice from the Taxi." A leaky roof, a rainstorm and a mudpuddle are of decided help in making the funny mishaps of this short film. Plenty of broad comedy, well played by the cast.

IOLE, THE CHRISTIAN (Selig), April 14.—Not a good theme for a one-reel, small-cast drama. Courts comparison with the screen dramas of Ancient Rome which have preceded it, and needs the same large treatment to be effective. Well played by Virginia Kirtley, Robyn Adair and E. J. Brady. Several beautiful scenes are shown.

HIS PHANTOM SWEETHEART (Vitagraph), April 14.—Reviewed by Louis R. Harrison on page 397, April 17, 1915.

THE TEST OF SINCERITY (Biograph), April 15.—This one-reel drama is a pleasant bit of fiction, that is none the less entertaining because it never happened. The excellent playing of Charles Perley, Robert Nolan, Augusta Anderson and Helen Bray make it thoroughly enjoyable.

THE BOUQUET (Essanay), April 15.—A "Sweedie" farce which extracts the last ounce of fun from the predicament in which a number of guests find themselves after being stung by an irritating plant, thanks to the blundering of the cooklady from Sweden. Wallace Beery continues to keep his impersonation of that young woman up to the mark.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL No. 30, 1915 (Selig), April 15.—Annual Easter egg-rolling on White House lawn; Heroes of the Diamond for the coming season, with special views of the opening game at the Polo Grounds, New York City; wreck at Farnoe Island, Denmark, of German aircraft; women starting for the Hague on Peace mission, and war pictures, lead the list of world happenings in this number.

STRENGTH (Vitagraph), April 15.—A three-character, one-reel Western drama, produced by Ulysses Davis. There is strength in the plot as well as in the title. George Stanley, Natalie De Lontan and Jack Mower do credit to their selection.

THE GIRL AND THE MATINEE IDOL (Biograph), April 16.—Reviewed by Lynde Denig on page 1943, issue of March 27.

THE FACE ON THE CURTAIN (Essanay), April 16.—A one-reel melodrama, with a "punch"—an intoxicated gentleman smashing in the door of his wife's room with the aid of a chair. The timely presence of a burglar prevents the lady from receiving serious bodily harm at the hands of her better-half. G. M. Anderson is effective as the burglar. Lee Willard and Marguerite Clayton play the married pair excellently.

THE ACCUSING PEN (Lubin), April 16.—A spirited Western drama, written by Will M. Ritchey and produced by Paul Powell, this one-reel photoplay furnishes good entertainment. Webster Campbell is a likeable hero and Dolly Larkin a heroine worth the winning.

THE STRENGTH OF A SAMSON (Selig), April 16.—A one-reel burlesque on the hero of over-heated melodrama, that has some very amusing moments. William Stowell is the muscular gentleman and Marion Warner the object of his adoration.

THE LOVE WHIP (Vitagraph), April 6.—A society comedy, with husband and wife playing at cross purposes and each receiving a much-needed lesson, this one-reel photoplay is cleverly written, and cleverly played by Lillian Walker, Evart Overton, Lillian Burns and the rest of the cast.

HIS SAD AWAKENING (Edison), April 13.—Henry Beldon's treatment of a genuninely humorous idea, in this one-reel farce, is skilful at all times, and the whimiscal turn of the incidents is maintained to the finish. William Wadsworth handles his "sissy" scenes with commendable restraint, and Arthur Housman gives a very funny burlesque of a tottering old man. Jessie Stevens and Olive Templeton help along the good work.

ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS (Biograph), April 17.—A one-reel drama with an interesting but rather hard-to-believe plot. However, the tangle is straightened out satisfactorily, the one hundred dollar bill doing the trick. Jack Mulhall and Irma Dawkins are the two people who are made happy by the money, and, in connection with Jack Drumeir, bring out all the points of the photoplay.

THE LANDING OF THE PILGRIMS (Edison), April 17.—The historical interest of this one-reel drama's theme is deftly blended with Longfellow's "The Courtship of Myles Standish." The scenes taken at Plymouth, Mass., showing the landing on Plymouth Rock, are very effective. Duncan McRae is a manly Myles Standish, Richard Tucker a properly retiring John Alden, and Margaret Prussing a demure Priscilla Mullins.

THE GIRL ENGINEER (Episode No. 23 of "The Hazards of Helen" Railroad Series) (Kalem), April 17.—Yes! she runs the train all right! In fact, it's more than likely that Helen can run the whole railroad, and will end by marrying the President of the road—and running him. A fast-time instalment, with an expert crew on the "run."

JUST LOOK AT JAKE (Lubin), April 17.—Shannon Fife has uncovered a comparatively new comedy plot in this one-reel offering, although a plumber is the fountain of fun that brings joy to the beholder. The part is in the capable hands of Walter Law. Joseph Kaufman and Ethel Clayton are the persecuted lovers, happily united by Jake. A splendid comic film.

THE JUNGLE STOCKADE (Jungle-Zoo Wild Animal Series) (Selig), April 17.—This is a very serious drama, dealing with the conversion to Christianity of an African king. The story is very well told. Lafayette McKee, Lillian Hayward, Marion Warner and C. B. Murphy act their respective roles with feeling and skill.

General Film Company Specials.

A DEADLY HATE (Edison), April 12.—Richard Ridgely, the producer of this three-part photoplay adapted from the drama by George Roberts, has given it the requisite melodramatic treatment and English atmosphere. Marc MacDermott's playing of the duel role of the twin brothers is also in the right key, and the air of mystery which pervades the story is skilfully maintained. Margaret Prussing makes a stately Lady Constance, and Mrs. Wallace Erskine, as Miss Pamila, is the English gentlewoman to the life.

THE TRAMP (Essanay), April 12.—A two-reel Charlie Chaplin release, with the famous comic hero a "Knight of the Road" and again rescuing beauty in distress with the aid of his trusty brick, this latest addition to the Chaplin series is a laugh-getter of the first rank. Nearly all of the situations and bits of business are clean, honest fun, and the few seconds of vulgarity which Mr. Chaplin permits himself should be cut from the film.

THE GIRL AND THE BACHELOR (Kalem), April 12.—This two-reel picture is rightly called a romantic comedy. There is an atmosphere of good breeding and refined environment about it that makes it doubly welcome. The story is simple, but never oversteps the bounds of probability, and the acting of Tom Moore, Marguerite Courtot and the rest of the cast keeps the tone of the performance at the proper pitch.

THE POETIC JUSTICE OF OMAR KHAN (Selig), April 12.—James Oliver Curwood has traveled over seas and across desert sands for the scenes of this two-reel romance. The result of his plotting is a tale of considerable power, the harsh justice of the Arab upon the disloyal wife and her companion, being highly dramatic. The desert scenes were finely produced. Guy Oliver plays Omar Khan with force and picturesque effect, and the Joan Merrick of Stella Razeto is tender and appealing. Eugenie Besserer, Harry Devies and Fred Huntley round out an excellent cast.

LORNA DOONE (Biograph), April 13.—Reviewed by Lynde Denig on page 1943, issue of March 27, 1915.

THE TURN OF THE WHEEL (Essanay), April 13.—Richard C. Traver's personality is well adapted to the leading role in this two-reel drama of business life. The fight for a fortune and a woman's love go hand in hand, and the plot reveals a sane and truthful picture of modern conditions, the characters being well clothed and well mannered. Lillian Drew plays the heroine gracefully and convincingly. Betty Scott, Jack Milton and Jack Meredith lend important aid to the scenes.

BETWEEN THE TWO OF THEM (Broadway Star Vitagraph), April 13.—Reviewed by Louis R. Harrison on page 397, April 17, 1915.

THE VOICE FROM THE TAXI (Episode No. 12 of "The Girl Detective" Series) (Kalem), April 14.—One reel and a half is utilized for this instalment of the "Lady Gumshoe's" adventures. The action of this number is not at all complicated and does not move with much spirit until near the end, when the lady's male assistant mixes it up with the villain in the liveliest kind of way, and walks off with all the honors of the occasion. A clean, professional "knockout" for Robert Gray.

A PRINCE OF PEACE (Lubin), April 14.—Herman A. Blackman is the author and Edgar Jones the producer of this two-reel drama. As the scenes are laid among the Kentucky mountaineers, the usual feud furnishes the motif, a desperate running fight between the rival families which calls for much firing of rifles and shotguns, leading to the final handshaking of the warring faction. However, Mr. Blackman leads up to his climax in a novel and effective manner, and the excellent playing of the entire cast brings out all the good points in the play.

RATED AT $10,000,000 (Lubin), April 15.—There are several original turns to this three-part drama by Adrian Gil-Spear, and plenty of life and movement in the telling. Like all "crook" plays, the criminals in it are of great assistance in securing their own conviction, but the working out of the theme is reasonably novel, and producer Joseph Smiley has handled it with his usual good judgment. Mr. Smiley also plays the detective with equal discernment. Jack Standing, William Cohill, John Smiley, Florence Williams and Lilie Leslie all give successful impersonations.

A WOMAN'S REVENGE (Edison), April 16.—Mary Rider has made an excellent drama of its class, and given Miriam Nesbitt a very effective character, in writing this two-reel melodrama of society and the underworld. The plot is not strikingly out-of-the-common, but it is put together with sincerity and is well supplied with heart interest. Miss Nesbitt makes the part of the lady of good impulses but damaged morals believable, by force of her own personality and finished art.

THE THIRD COMMANDMENT (Kalem), April 16.—Reviewed by H. C. Judson on page 239, issue of April 10.

THE RETURN OF RICHARD NEAL (Essanay), April 17.—Edward T. Lowe, Jr., has pitted two hypnotists against each other in his three-part drama, the evil control of one psychological expert over a young girl being broken by the greater power of another hypnotic worker. The story is an absorbing one, and furnishes Francis X. Bushman with a role that fits him mentally and physically. Nellie Craig is excellent as the hypnotist's victim. A high-class production throughout.

ELSA'S BROTHER (Vitagraph), April 17.—There is much quiet strength in the acting of this two-part drama, by the efficient cast. W. A. Tremayne has supplied a human, self-respecting story, and Van Dyke Brooke has given it every advantage known to the art of the producer. Mr. Brooke also impersonates the kindly old watchmaker with fine insight and authority. Norma Talmadge plays Elsa with sincerity and charm, and S. Ranin Drew is a convincing John Smardon.

Mutual Film Corporation.

GUZZLE'S WAYWARD PATH (Keystone), April 10.—Syd Chaplin is the star of this farce comedy, which is a good one. Some novel innovations have been introduced in the course of the picture; for instance, upon coming in from an afternoon's hunting he hangs his "trusty hound," which happens to be a small terrier in harness, on a hook on the hall rack. For this injustice to the small animal his wife does likewise to him, and when the minister and his wife call accidentally the man of the house is still decorating the hall rack.

THE BEAUTY BUNGLERS (Keystone), April 12.—This film is in many ways very good. It is true that once or twice during its run it is felt that the business of the play oversteps the mark; but on the whole the picture is a rattling good farce comedy. Charles Murray is the funny man.

MUTUAL WEEKLY No. 15, 1915 (Mutual), April 15.—Interesting items of this number are the new aerial warrior bought by Russia from the U. S., the Boston Y. M. C. A. athletes enter a foot race in a blinding snow storm, Madame Aida of the Metropolitan Opera House poses for the moving picture camera, Montreal Tommies reviewed by the Duke of Connaught, and the Chinese Government burns large quantities of opium in an effort to stop its use in China.

THE LIGHT IN THE WINDOW (Reliance), April 16.—Otto Lincoln, William Hinckley, Mae Gaston and Eleanor Washington comprise the cast in this production. The story is not out of the ordinary, but it has been nicely developed, and will prove an acceptable offering for any audience. It is the story of how a miserly father drove his son from the house because he attempted to take some money from the cash box, being driven to it through the stinginess of his father.

ETHEL'S NEW DRESS (Komic), April 18, No. 21 of the "Bill" series.—Fay Tincher impersonates a countess at a reception. A girl thief does the same thing and some good comedy scenes ensue. The thefts were carried out with just the right touch of burlesque. This is a good number.

THE STAIN OF DISHONOR (Reliance), April 19.—A rather obvious plot, in which some fortification plans are stolen at a military ball. The hero is suspected, but through some spilled ink the crime is traced to the real offender. This works up to a good close and is well photographed.

OH, DADDY! (Beauty), April 20.—This picture is a well-dressed, well-directed one. It contains a commendable attempt at light comedy. The joke of the situation is that Papa wins the neighbor in the face of the competition of his two sons. Pussy takes a hand in the fun also, knocks over a vase in the night, and sets her mistress trembling for fear of a burglar.

THE STORY OF A STORY (Majestic), April 20.—A strong number, which tells a good story and conveys a worthy moral at the same time. The author, intending to write a book of trash, dreams of some of the evils it may do. One of the good features in this pleasing release is the clever photographic effects. A good offering.

SHE WALKETH ALONE (American), April 21.—The story of a girl nurse who sacrifices her own love for another. This is well photographed and has a good cast, including Vivian Rich, David Lithgoe and others. Some of the scenes are choppy; the girl becomes a nurse without any apparent preliminary training. This is fairly strong.

ROSE LEAVES (Reliance), April 21.—The story of a man whose wife dies and leaves him with a girl baby to raise. In later years the sight of his wife's wedding dress on the girl saves him from the clutches of an adventuress. The story is just a little vague in development, though the cast is quite pleasing. It makes a fairly strong offering.

THE HANDICAP OF BEAUTY (Falstaff), April 23.—The story of a pretty girl stenographer who flees from one employer to another because they annoy her. She at last dresses very plainly and wins the love of a good man. This makes quite a pleasing little story.

THE REFORMATION OF PETER AND PAUL (Thanhouser), April 23.—Two bad boys grow up to be priggish young men. The girls grow up still full of mischief and determine to put more life into the boys. The idea is a good one and should have been carried out more strongly. The abrupt ending comes just as the story is becoming most interesting.

FASHIONS AND THE SIMPLE LIFE (Thanhouser), April 25.—The story of a lady model and a salesman who dislike their business and yearn for the simple life. The theme in this is better than the handling, but it is fairly interesting as it stands.

LOCKED OUT (Royal), May 1.—Harry Jackson has produced this excellent comedy. It is founded on a simple story which has been made the most of. A young wife left alone one night while her husband goes on a business trip steps outside the door to take a message. The fact that she has only a kimona thrown on over her pajamas, and that the door closes and locks on her brings about a very funny chase through the halls of the apartment house, out on the fire escape, and through various bedrooms. The result of a cleverly handled situation is very amusing.

Mutual Film Corporation Specials.

A MAN FOR ALL THAT (Reliance), April 17.—R. A. Walsh has directed this two-reel production and is deserving of great credit on the strength of the admirable result of his work. In the cast are Miriam Cooper, Elmer Clifton and Tom Wilson. The story of the picture treats of the arrest of a young man on circumstantial evidence. The opening of the picture, however, introduces him on the day of his release from prison. He has the good fortune to come up with a lad who has run away with a circus, and in taking him home he, too, is taken into the family, from which he afterwards parts, only to be brought back again by the detective who had him arrested, and who tells the story of the confession of the real burglar.

THE HIGHBINDERS (Majestic), April 18.—A two-reel drama set in the Chinese quarter of what is, evidently, a western city. The production, which has been staged by Tod Browning is, to say the least, unique. A great many genuine Chinamen have taken part in the picture, which treats of the marriage of an unfortunately placed young woman to a Chinaman who was kind to her. The story skips several years and the daughter of the couple is kidnapped for her beauty by a gang of Chinamen, after they have killed her father. The production is thrilling and too rich in startling incidents to enumerate them here. It can also lay claim to having been artistically made.

THE CASTLE RANCH (American), April 19.—This is an excellent two-reel comedy-drama, and one of the best pictures that the American Film Company has produced in some time. The production has real comedy merit, although it is still not without its inconsistencies. Especially in its early stages it lacks smoothness, but it is surely destined to entertain well a great many audiences.

AT LAST, MY LOVE! (Serial Publication Corp., Reliance), April 21.—Instalment No. XV, the last of the Runaway June series. This contains one or two surprises and brings the foolish young bride back to her husband's arms—and pocketbook. She is convinced that her objection to depending on him financially was largely a matter of false pride. The scenes in this number occur on the returning steamer and in New York. The motive in this has proven rather slight for serial purposes. The cast has done its work well and some very good effects were achieved, particularly in the Bermuda scenes.

GUZZLE RIVAL'S JONAH (Keystone), April 26.—A two-reel Syd Chaplin picture which has no lack of action and would be considered one of the best of the Keystone farce comedies. Guzzle and his exacting wife take a water trip, during the course of which some remarkable acrobatic feats are performed, which ends in Guzzle and the fat man of the picture landing in the water. The rescue of the two comedians is a funny piece of business.

BIANCA FORGETS (Thanhouser), April 27.—A two-reel offering featuring Florence LaBadie, Morris Foster and others. The girl becomes enamored of a French count and turns down her own lover to go with him to a charity ball. The lover meets her there. The count is mistaken for an embezzler, but turns out to be a genuine nobleman. He afterwards assists in righting the wrong he has done and helps bring the lovers together again. This story is not exceptional in any way, but runs along entertainingly and makes altogether quite a pleasing offering.

THE RENEGADE (Broncho), April 28.—An adventure offering, with Charles Ray, Louise Glaum and others in the cast. The young captain is cruising in the South Seas, where he is made captive by Graves, a white slaver of Africa. The favorite slave girl aids him to escape and he promises to return and marry her. The later scenes occur in civilization, picturing the captain's revenge on the white slaver and his decision to keep his promise to the girl. This is picturesque in setting and quite pleasing in many respects.

THE POWER OF THE STREET (Domino), April 29.—A two-reel financial play, with Walter Edwards, Clara Williams and others in the cast. Steele brings home a friend to dinner, the friend falls in love with Steele's wife. Later he gives Steele a false tip on the market and breaks him, at the same time running off with his wife. Steele goes to Alaska, strikes it rich and later returns to Wall street, where he has his revenge. The story has a conventional start but works up to scenes of stronger interest toward the close. The wrecking of Hanlon was dramatic and the number as a whole is somewhat stronger than the average production.

THE VALLEY OF HATE (Kaybee), April 30.—A two-reel number, featuring Rhea Mitchell and Thos. Chatterton. The yarn is a feud story and pictures the young man school teacher coming to take charge of the mountain school. The girl is one of his pupils and has her head full of the glory of fighting. He teaches the pupils that shooting in the back is cowardly. Later the girl sacrifices her own safety to save him. She is shot by her father, who is really trying to kill the teacher, but recovers, and the close is a happy one. This contains some pretty settings and makes the most of its rather familiar plot material. It is well up to the average in every way.

ENOCH ARDEN (Mutual Masterpicture-Majestic), April.—Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison on page 568, issue of April 24.

MAN'S PREROGATIVE (Mutual Masterpicture Reliance), April. — A Reliance four-reel production starring Robert Edeson, with Mary Alden playing the feminine lead. This also belongs to the Masterpictures Program, and has been produced by George Nichols from a scenario written by Frank E. Woods. The story in the first place has not dealt easily with the subject, for in trying to present a truth which there is no denying, there has been a slight tendency to overdraw the situation, thereby retarding a natural development. There is also noticeable considerable padding, and a brief story is told with labor. It must be remembered at the same time that to the average audience the picture would have rather a strong appeal.

CAPTAIN MACKLIN (Mutual Masterpicture-Majestic), April.—To add to the program of Masterpictures there has been made by the Majestic Motion Picture Corporation a four-reel version of Richard Harding Davis' story, "Captain Macklin." This production was directed by John B. O'Brien, and although not quite up to the standard maintained in "The Outcast," in which John O'Brien put forth his best efforts, still it is far beyond the usual quality of feature pictures. It is distinctly human, although at times we noticed a drop in the naturalness of the development. The story is one that is energetic and up to date, and it has been smoothly carried in the picture. Jack Conway plays the role of Capt. Macklin, and Lillian Gish that of Beatrice, his cousin.

The Pathe Exchange Inc.

PATHE NEWS No. 28, 1915 (April 5-10).—Some of the interesting items of this number are a new railway device by means of which a moving train can pick up eggs without breaking them, the annual Easter egg rolling contest in the White House grounds, Russian heavy field guns in action in the Carpathians, and the camp of the Australian troops in Egypt.

SEVILLE, THE ANCIENT CAPITAL OF ANDALUSIA (April).—An interesting scenic, giving many views of the ancient city, showing its principal buildings, and other points of historic interest. This is on the same reel with Athletic Exercises and Tests of Strength in the French army.

ATHLETIC EXERCISES AND TESTS OF STRENGTH IN THE FRENCH ARMY (April).—This is a very interesting illustration of the manner in which the men of the French army are trained and fitted for the strenuous work expected of them when in active service. All sorts of athletics are indulged in, in the course of which some remarkable acrobatic feats are performed.

POLICE DOG No. 4 (April).—An unusually comic episode of the "Police Dog" series of animated cartoons. This is on the same reel with "Storm and Calm on the Coast of Sicily."

STORM AND CALM ON THE COAST OF SICILY (April).—One of the most fascinating of scenics, showing some beautifully photographed views of a turbulent sea on the coast of Sicily, followed by others of the same waters in a quieter mood. On the same reel with the above.

MAX ON THE BRINY (April).—As would be inferred, this is a Max Linder picture. It is in fact Max Linder all around, having been written as well as played by him. The picture comprises a series of comical incidents which occur when Max goes aboard a sea-going yacht in the Bay of Monaca. Previous to boarding the vessel Max has taken too much to drink, hence the fun.

THE NEW EXPLOITS OF ELAINE (Episode No. 2, 16th of Elaine) "The Cryptic Ring," (April 12-17).—Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald on page 569, issue of April 24.

United Film Service.

BROTHERS (Premier), April 27.—This film tells the story of a young woman who, because her father had been shot and killed by a sheriff, refused to marry the young sheriff of the district. An accident which occurs later on, when her own brother shoots the sheriff's brother, changes conditions. The injured man recovers, there is an exchange of good wishes and forgiveness and everything goes well.

CAN A MAN FOOL HIS WIFE (Cameo), April 29.—One of the "Dudley" series, evidently the first. Dan Mason and Harry Kelly play the leads. It may be said that the comedy presented in this one of the series is rather refreshing, being well done and free from vulgarity. Uncle Dudley and Dudley, Jr., set out by themselves to have a good time, but Mrs. Dudley, Jr., getting wise to the situation, follows. The business of this play is exceptionally good. The principal scenes take place in a country hotel.

JEALOUSY (Starlight), April 29.—An Aubrey and Kendig comedy in which they are appointed guardians of a beautiful young girl. They both endeavor to marry her to get her money. The girl employs one of her friends to wean them away from her. Considerable of what might be termed "horse play" occurs by way of comedy.

WHERE CAN I GET A WIFE? (Cameo), May.—Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald on page 567, issue of April 24.

United Film Service Specials.

THE STOLEN WILL (Grandin), April 28.—A two-reel picture from the Smallwood studios which is exceptionally pleasing. It has the form of a mild melodrama and is quaintly pretty in spots; for instance, where the young woman (Ethel Grandin) and her little five-year-old charge cavort in the park. The story has plenty of human interest, plenty of action, and has been carefully converted into film.

THE BEGINNING AT THE END (Ideal), May 1.—Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald on page 572, issue of April 24.

Universal Film Mfg. Co.

ANIMATED WEEKLY No. 162 (Universal), April 14.—A St. Louis trade carnival, meeting of state executives, fall game openings, destruction of a bridge and the burning of a Russian city are featured in this entertaining number.

POOR POLICY (L-Ko), April 25.—This is a pleasing low comedy, except for one vulgar touch at the end, which may be eliminated. The ostrich farm incidents were amusing and novel. The insurance policy scheme to raise money also worked out pleasingly. A good comedy of the type, featuring Billy Ritchie.

"CY" PERKINS IN THE CITY OF DELUSION (Joker), April 26.—Ernest Shield has a dream in this number, in which he visits Universal City. He meets President Carl Laemmle and various moving picture performers. The film has no particular plot, but is amusing in spots and quite entertaining.

FACES IN THE NIGHT (Rex), April 27.—A strong subject of its kind. Charles Ogle plays the part of a wealthy mining man, haunted by an injustice he has done to the family of his former partner. The Alaska scenes were interesting and realistic. He makes reparation by going into the slums and bringing the girl home. This makes a stronger number than the average.

SHAVED IN MEXICO (L-Ko), April 28.—Hank Mann exhibits promising characteristics in this slapstick number. He gets many laughs throughout the film, which pictures a Mexican story in costume. This is much better than the average offering of this company.

COURAGE (Big "U") April 29.—The girl in this story gives up her first lover for a Westerner whose tales of his bravery win her admiration. Later the husband quails at giving up his blood for transfusion to his sick child. The original lover comes forward and offers his blood. This story is fairly strong enough, though it contains no graphic situations. The cast is pleasing.

HER FRIEND, THE MILKMAN (Nestor), April 30.—An unusually good comedy number, featuring Eddie Lyons and Billie Rhodes as milkman and maid, respectively. Their love affair is handled pleasingly and naturally. This puts new life in an old situation and will appeal strongly to the average observer.

Universal Film Mfg. Co., Specials.

INHERITED SIN (Universal Special), April 26.—Episode No. 8 of The Black Box Series. This interesting installment is devoted entirely to the pursuit of Craig, who flees to England. Quest learns that Craig comes from a criminal family of English servant class. The manhunt in the marsh country was well staged. The later adventures in the Hamblen house, owned by Lord Ashleigh, were also good. The second reel closes with the promise of some further thrills in this mysterious old house.

THE HONOR OF THE ORMSBYS (Victor), April 26.—A three-reel number, written by Wm. Addison Lathrop and enacted by a cast including Charles Ogle, Mary Fuller and Matt Moore. The story concerns the scapegrace son of a wealthy man, who marries a dancer. The father disowns him and he cannot earn a living for his wife and child. He is also addicted strongly to drink. Later he is shanghaied and life on the ocean makes a man of him. The wife remains true and there is a final reconciliation with the father. Some of the scenes are hurried and show lack of feeling, but the photography and cast are good. The closing scenes are pleasing.

MATTY'S DECISION (Gold Seal), April 27.—This is the second two-reel offering featuring Christy Matthewson, the famous Giant pitcher. He plays ball against his rival for the girl's hand, makes a "sacrifice" decision in the other's favor, but later wins the girl just the same. This production runs along in an entertaining way, though the story is not exceptional. The photography is pleasing and the cast an attractive one. Dorothy Phillips plays the girl and Hobart Henley the rival.

A PROPHET OF THE HILLS (Laemmle), April 28.—A mountain feud story in two reels, containing some picturesque scenic effects. The cast includes Marc Robbins, Helen Leslie and Frank Lloyd. The feud story is of course very familiar in its general development. This production has no exceptional qualities, but tells a well-connected story and there are a few incidents with a touch of human nature in them. The prophet is killed in his efforts to bring peace to the warring factions.

UNLIKE OTHER GIRLS (Rex), April 29.—A two-reel subject, written by Ida May Park, with Pauline Bush and Ray Gallegher in the cast. The story is one of rivalry between two railroad lunch-counter institutions and strikes the observer as fresh and pleasing. Some of the pastoral scenes at the beginning are unusually attractive and would have been more so except for a slight unevenness in the photography. But the number is acceptable throughout; it is different and the rivalry between the lunch rooms seemed like a touch of real life.

AT THE BANQUET TABLE (Imp), April 30.—A two-reel number, written by Harvey Gates, with King Baggot, Arline Pretty and others in the cast. The story is a sort of comedy of errors, with tragic possibilities always confronting the participants. The Jones family and their next-door neighbors get their affairs considerably entangled when the lieutenant is brought to the wrong house intoxicated. The wife shoots at him and thinks she has killed him. A number of complications immediately follow, which serve to hold the attention. The photography is good and the story proves fairly strong; it turns out to be a banquet table nightmare.

NABBED (Bison), May 1.—A three-reeled tenderloin story written by Grace Cunard and dedicated to Chief Sebastian of the Los Angeles police force. It pictures a raid on a fast house by the police force. The chief's daughter, who has been lured there, is saved by a fast woman whom the chief had befriended. This is staged in an ample way and gives a realistic picture of the interior and inmates of the resort raided. Among the latter is a woman who had been posing as a reformer. The chief motive of the production, if it can be said to have one, is to prove that all reformers are not sincere. The reporter comedians were funny, but out of keeping with the rest of the story; the author should feature them in a different production.

Ann-Eve Mansfield

THE camera man had signalled for action, the players in the two-reel society drama had begun their gay dance in the brilliant ball-room "set" in the studio of the Ideal Company at Hollywood, when suddenly actors, directors, camera men, extras—all—were thrown into confusion. A tiny maid with wondering blue eyes in a torn gingham frock and worn-out shoes edged her way around the gilded furniture into the very center of the scene. She had not been bidden, this little cherub with the rose-bud mouth. No one had ever laid eyes on her before. She had spoiled the picture—but since it was spoiled, actors, directors, camera men, extras—all—crowded around to find out from what portion of the heavens she had dropped.

"I wanted to see the party," said the little maid, now frightened and with tears trembling on her long lashes. "I want my mama," and she tried to break through the group who had surrounded her. But there were many only too eager to wipe the tears away, and soon the little maid was high on the shoulders of Will Sheerer, the character man, munching candy and quite at home.

This was the introduction of Ann-Eve Mansfield, the idol of the United Program. After she had been introduced, it took no time for the directors to discover that her very unconsciousness and childish simplicity would make her quite as wonderful an addition to the Ideal Company as they could hope to find. And so Ann-Eve's mother was found, and Ann-Eve herself engaged as a regular motion picture actress.

Ann-Eve Mansfield.

Since Ann-Eve has joined the Ideal Company, she has appeared in a large number of juvenile pictures which have brought adoring audiences to their knees. She has large blue eyes, light hair, and a fine, sturdy little body which has been called "perfect" for her years. Recently, Ann-Eve's little sister, Leonore, has been brought into the films, and the two children, together with Clara Horton, another juvenile, have created a furor whenever they have been featured on the Unitd Program.

Olga Petrova

OLGA PETROVA, now starring in her most recent dramatic success "Panthea" under the management of Messrs. Shuberts, signed contracts with the Popular Plays and Players Company last week, giving that concern exclusive service for a period of two years and calling for her appearance in sixteen motion picture productions during that time. The first of the sixteen will be "The Heart of a Painted Woman" which will be released through the Metro Pictures Corporation on April 19th.

Olga Petrova.

Mme. Petrova made her first appearance in pictures in the Popular Plays and Players production of "The Tigress," and efforts were made shortly after this picture was released to prevail upon Petrova to enter the field permanently. The noted actress then declined, saying she considered her work before the camera merely a diversion. After seeing "The Tigress" and more recently "The Heart of a Painted Woman," Mme. Petrova seriously considered the offer of the Popular Plays and Players with the result that the two year contract was entered into last Friday.

When "Panthea" opened, Mme. Petrova was merely featured, but after a week at the Booth theater the billing was changed, at great expense, and Petrova became a star. A series of highly interesting dramatic vehicles will be supplied Mme. Petrova giving her ample opportunity to display her emotional powers. The Popular Plays and Players will stage the Petrova pictures at the studio, Fort Lee, New Jersey.

Bushman a Metro Player

Prominent Star Signs for Long Period—Will Appear Under "Quality Pictures" Brand.

FRANCIS X. BUSHMAN, whose association with the Essanay Company of Chicago will terminate May 1st, has placed his name to a long term contract to appear exclusively on the program of the Metro Pictures Corporation under the brand name of "Quality Pictures" which will be released at an average of one production per month.

No little surprise was occasioned by the announcement in the trade that Mr. Bushman was to sever his connections with Essanay and cast his lot with Metro. Rumors regarding Mr. Bushman's future have been current for some little time, but it was thought that when May 1st approached he would renew his contract with his old concern. Fred J. Balshoffer engineered the deal. Richard A. Rowland and Joseph Engel, acting for the Metro Pictures Corporation, consummated the deal through Mr. Balshoffer, who, as directing head and president of the Quality Pictures Corporation, under which title the Bushman pictures will be released.

Francis X. Bushman.

Mr. Bushman is now working on his final picture with Essanay, and will leave for Los Angeles May 2nd, going direct and taking with him his complete equipment of pets, wardrobe and paraphernalia, including four horses, two motor cars and several hundred singing canaries. That Mr. Bushman is fond of, and a great collector of Hartz Mountain singing birds, is not well known, but he is said to be the possessor of the biggest collection in the United States and rarely moves for a long period, to any place that he does not take a number of the birds with him.

Under the name of "Quality Pictures" the pictures in which Metro will present Bushman, a policy of one production a month will be followed and nothing but the biggest and most powerful of dramatic pieces will be selected for Bushman's use. The Metro Pictures Corporation already controls a large number of plays and fiction works, which will be turned over to Mr. Balshoffer and these will be used entirely for Bushman.

Mr. Balshoffer is now in the east and on a still hunt for a leading woman to work opposite Bushman. He has been interviewing a number of prominent picture actresses and stage stars and says he will continue until he gets the perfect type of ingenue to harmonize with his big male star.

The first "Quality" production to be released on the Metro program will, in all probability, be seen about June 15th and from that date forward the releases will occur on an average of every five weeks.

The contract between the Quality Pictures Corporation and Mr. Bushman is for a long period of years and is said to be quite the most liberal ever tendered a male star by a producing company. Mr. Balshoffer is now making his offices at the Metro Pictures Corporation, 1465 Broadway.

Bill Bailey on United Program

Former Essanay Star Co-Director with Edwin August in Pyramid Pictures.

Edwin August and Bill Bailey will co-direct and co-star in the new Pyramid pictures now in course of production at the Smallwood Studios in Cliffside, New Jersey. There has always been a belief among picture producers that no artist can direct and act at the same time and do both himself and the production full justice. To make sure on this point manager Arthur Smallwood evolved the scheme of finding two well-known actor-directors who could see the advantage of working together in the same picture and co-operating with each other in its direction. Mr. August and Mr. Bailey saw the wisdom of such an arrangement and thus the brains of two clever directors will be put into the staging of the same picture which will also contain two star leading men in the cast of characters.

Following out this same idea Mr. Smallwood arranged for the two well-known leading ladies, Iva Sheppard, late of the Universal and Famous Players Pictures, and Ruth Blair, to appear in the same productions with Edwin August and Bill Bailey. With this exceptionally strong company of players, which also includes Harry Mainhall, late of the Essanay Company, Pyramid one and two reel productions promise to do much in helping the United Program in its fight to raise the standard of short-story pictures.

Alexander Gaden

FOLLOWING the policy of the Life Photo Film Corporation, producing features with the best possible cast obtainable, Alexander Gaden, the popular screen leading man, and winner of the Morning Telegraph Popularity Contest, was engaged to play the part of the "Governor," opposite Mary Nash, in the five-part Life Photo feature, "The Unbroken Road."

Mr. Gaden has had a long and varied experience behind the footlights and on the screen. He has been connected with the best of legitimate, vaudeville and motion picture companies. He has written several successful playlets and photoplays.

His greatest success behind the footlights was made in such characters as "John Rance," "Raffles," "John Strong," "Strongheart" and "D'Artagnan."

His first work on the screen was with the Famous Players Company in "The Count of Monte Cristo." He then joined the forces of the Universal Company, and then appeared in Vitagraph features, returning to the Famous Players Company, playing opposite Cecilia Loftus in "A Lady of Quality."

Alexander Gaden.

Mr. Gaden, before contracting with the Life Photo Film Corporation, had under consideration several tempting offers from other feature producers, but cast his lot with the Life Photo forces, considering the character of their productions, being strictly stage plays adapted to photoplay form, offering him a wider scope or field for the possibilities of his unusual talents than by appearing in indiscriminate photoplays of other producers.

The part that Mr. Gaden has been cast for in "The Unbroken Road" is that of John Radford, the Governor.

"Runaway June" Contest

New Plan Enables Theaters Already Running the Serial to Enter Contest Without Loss of Votes.

THEATERS which are now running the serial "Runaway June" and which have been delayed in starting the "Runaway June" Free-Trip-to-California Contest, are now enabled, through arrangements completed this week by the Reliance Motion Picture Corporation, to enter the contest on terms of full equality with theaters which are just beginning to run the serial. In this way such theaters are enabled to reap the full benefit of the thousands of dollars spent on national advertising by the Reliance. In other words a theater which has exhibited number six for instance, can enter the contest on an equality with a theater which is just beginning the first episode.

The plan briefly is this: There are to be fourteen votings for prize-winners in each of the "Runaway June" theaters. There are fifteen episodes in the serial, but on the occasion when episode number one is shown the women who are to compete for the free trips to California are nominated by the audience. So there are, as has been said, fourteen votings for prize-winners at each theater in which "Runaway June" is shown.

To illustrate, suppose a manager has run episode number one and wishes to start a contest in his theater at the showing of episode number two. Candidates are nominated in his theater. He thus has thirteen showings of the serial at which voting takes place. There must be fourteen votings in his theater, so he is short one. Consequently in a day between the showing of episode number fourteen and fifteen he has an extra contest day. The voting takes place on that day, though the film is not shown then. Thus he has fourteen votings in his theater.

The exhibitor who has run two episodes of "Runaway June" before he starts the contest is thus short two votings. The exhibitor who has run three, is short three, etc. So the man who is short two votings has two extra contest days, one between the fourteenth and fifteenth episodes, and one between the thirteenth and fourteenth. A similar schedule is carried out for exhibitors who start the contest with any episode up to the eleventh.

Program at Vitagraph Theater.

Betty Gray Appears for First Time in Vitagraph Life Portrayals.—A Good Bill.

IN PRESENTING the three-part modern detective drama "The Girl Who Might Have Been," as the feature of the Vitagraph Theatre program for the week commencing Sunday, April 25th, the Broadway Star Feature Company made a happy selection. Not only does "The Girl Who Might Have Been," which was written by Charles Brown, have all the characteristics of "a best seller" with thrilling detective adventures and criminal activity in which the master mind of a robber band is finally captured, but enlists the services of an all-star cast in its enactment. Lionel Belmore, the director, has visualized the sliding panel, the secret passageway, the ruses by which criminals evade the law, the third degree, the consequent pistol duel and hand to hand struggle on the roof and final triumph of the detective. Another feature of "The Girl Who Might Have Been," will be the introduction to Broadway audiences of Betty Gray, a new member of the Vitagraph Stock Company, whose work as Enid Langford, the unwilling accomplice of a master crook will attract attention. Harry Morey, Ned Finley, Edward Elkas, Frank Currier and Paul Scardon are the other members of the cast who portray the principal characters.

Number Six of Roy L. McCardell's Famous Jarr Family Series, "The Jarrs Visit Arcadia," will introduce Rose Tapley and Harry Davenport in characteristic Jarr Family contretempts. Another of Elaine Sterne's delightful "Sonny Jim" stories "When a Feller's Nose is Out of Joint," presents Bobby Connelly on the advent of a baby brother in his home. "Cutey's Sister," a story of a college boy whose bluff is called, in which Wally Van, Nitra Frazer, Albert Roccardi and Cissy Fitz-Gerald have congenial roles and "A Lily in Bohemia," William Addison Lathrop's story of an artist's way of curing domestic unhappiness, will present Lillian Walker and Templer Saxe, complete the comedy subjects of the program.

The second dramatic feature will be a visualization of James Oliver Curwood's powerful story, "The Awakening," in which a Doctor is forced to choose between a woman to whom he is engaged and a beautiful girl of the slums. "The Awakening" is graphically portrayed in the principal characterizations by Anita Stewart and Earle Williams, under the direction of producer Ralph W. Ince.

"Hypocrites" Sensation All Over Country.

Bosworth, Inc., Film Allegory Creating Great Interest Wherever Shown.

SELDOM in the history of motion pictures, has a film subject received more attention on the part of the public, as well as the press, all over the country, than the sensational Bosworth, Inc., production, "Hypocrites."

Released immediately after its memorable opening at the Longacre theater, New York, where it overshadowed every othr attraction in the public eye, either on the legitimate stage or in motion picture houses, bookings began to pour into the offices of the Paramount exchanges throughout the country and elaborate preparations to present the subject on a large scale were promptly set under way. The special musical score—both vocal and instrumental—which had been arranged to accompany the film, together with the introductory speech, were rehearsed and appropriate stage settings were designed to give the production a dignified presentation everywhere.

One of the first out-of-town showings was given "Hypocrites" by J. H. Kunsky, of the Kunsky Theatrical Enterprises, at the Washington theater, Detroit. Here the production was given one of its most pretentious presentations under the care of Mr. Kunsky and his associates. The film, after being greeted by acclaim by the clergy, Board of Education and the Police Department, broke all records for attendance in Detroit, playing to 10,000 people the first three days. By popular demand the production was held over a week after the termination of its original booking and then played a return engagement for another week. Reports of similar success in other cities throughout the country are being received daily, and bookings are in as much demand as ever.

Despite the success of this much discussed film wherever it is shown, difficulties are sometimes encountered by the film men in showing the subject on account of the difference of opinion, which in a few localities has widely varied. In Los Angeles, for instance, the film has created no end of discussion, resulting in the decision to show it before a judge and jury. In Boston the Mayor has refused to allow the film to be shown in its present state, but finally agreed to let it appear in the Hub if the naked figure of "Truth" be suitably draped. The remarkable task of draping the figure on the film has been undertaken by a laboratory expert who is now working on the film and all Boston is awaiting with interest the coming of "Clothed Truth."

Fred (Otherwise Bing) Thompson.

FRED (OTHERWISE BING) THOMPSON is a logical product of the theatrical field making good every time as a motion picture producer. A temperamental Scotch Canadian, a sportsman, gentleman and scholar, he produced for the best companies, including Sothern-Marlow, Belasco, Brady, and ultimately "found himself" psychologically and mentally, in pictures.

Fred Thompson.

From Vitagraph to Universal, from Universal to Lasky; and from Lasky to World Film is his record. With World Film, that is at Fort Lee, he has found his proper environment; and the first of his efforts is soon to be released under the title of "Woman and Wine," based upon the old Brady success. Fred can handle strong dramatic scenes. He is the reverse of a reposeful director, and with characteristic frankness he declares "Woman and Wine" to be a great picture. And Fred knows. His judgment of pictures may be estimated from the fact that he made the "Sign of the Cross" and "The Christian" and is now at work on the Wm. A. Brady feature "After Dark," in which Alec B. Francis is to appear as "Old Tom," Brady's best and greatest part.

Paul Panzer Back from Lecture Trip

Villain had Good Time in New England, Made Many Friends and Brought Big Roll Back.

PAUL PANZER dropped in to see his many friends in the Moving Picture World office this past week. We know Paul down here and can say that there is no one whom we welcome gladlier or take more pleasure in seeing. It was merely a friendy visit, but we got him to tell his recent experiences of the lecture trip through New England. He is interesting, and the more he talks and the better we know him, the better we like him. He is a man whose popularity is founded on a solid foundation of hearty respect.

Paul Panzer.

The trip, as our readers well know, came after he had won a big block of added recognition by his work in "The Perils of Pauline" series. The people who had seen him in the pictures wanted to meet him personally and he got an offer to lecture over the Keith's and the Poli's circuits. He lectured in a few towns during the latter part of last December and began the regular trip on January 3 at Lawrence, Mass. From there he went to Brockton for three days and then to Attleboro for three days at the Colonial, managed by Albert Allen for his mother, the owner. Sympathy seemed to be against him at first; for, you remember, he was the villain and for a half day they treated him a bit coldly. But it didn't last—how could it? People began to come in crowds and the children (the apple of Paul Panzer's eye is his own little Margerie, three and a half years old), astonished him by knowing him. He was tickled by their calling him by name and taking a friendly interest in him. At his last lecture, the Colonial usher brought him a big bunch of American beauty roses tied with a satin ribbon. "It was as big as that," said he, measuring with his hands. "I was so overcome that I didn't know what to do. They made me come out again, and, do you know, I really began to bawl right into the flowers."

At Nashua, a few days later, he had such a good time that he said to the manager. "The people at the theater here have been so kind to me that I want to reciprocate in some way." "Oh, you needn't do that," was the answer. "The boys have a little spread for you after the last show." Panzer ordered a keg of beer brought to the hall and they all had a good time. Afterward, they presented him with a gold stick pin, a wish bone, set with a diamond, and this letter:

"Friend Paul:—As it's always good weather when good fellows get together, accept this little gift as a token of our best regards. From the boys of the band room. Yours truly,

"George R. La Bounty, violinist."

From Nashua, he returned to Boston, beginning at the Bolton Square. Edwin McCloskey, the World's Boston representative, played the part of friend and guide to make sure he had a good time while in the city. He acted as Paul's lieutenant at first; but was quickly promoted to be captain for distinguished service—he introduced Paul to John L. Sullivan. Technically, it was Captain Sullivan of the Boston police force who did the introducing, but McCloskey was the cause of it. In a former issue of this paper we have told of the cordial reception Governor Walsh gave to him.

On January 28-30 he was lecturing at the Colonial theater in Newport. The manager asked him to let little Margerie come out just for a minute, and her mother consented. She had a lace dress on which her mother had made and the ribbon that came on the bunch of roses given to him in Attleboro. Paul says that he never yet was applauded that way: for the people fairly came up. Margerie called, "Goodbye, folks," and the next day the morning papers said that she was more popular than even her dad.

One of his most interesting experiences came in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., near the close of the trip. But to make it clear we shall have to go back some eighteen years, and to Germany. At that time Dr. Ludwig M. Gross, now of Millbrook, N. Y., was serving in the German army and had a Damon and Pythias friendship with one of his comrades. The two were young lieutenants in the same battery. After leaving the army they lost track of each other; though the memories of the glad old days remained.

Years passed and Dr. Gross came to America and settled in Millbrook. Several months ago he went to a picture show in Poughkeepsie and saw a well-known face on the screen. "Donnerwetter," he gasped, "it is Paul." After the show he asked the name of his old-time friend, but it was very like the name. When Panzer was in Poughkeepsie, some one told Dr. Gross of it and he came to the theater where, sure as life, there was his friend, Lieutenant Paul Panzerbeiter. He rushed around to the stage entrance and in a few minutes the two old army comrades threw themselves into one anothers arms and slapped each other on the back and there was a multitude of many syllabled German words.

Jamaica Likes Picture People

Tom Terriss and His Associates Being Royally Entertained in the Hope That Other Producers Will Visit the Island.

TOM TERRISS and a number of his associates in the Terriss Feature Film Company, who are at present engaged in producing feature photoplays in Jamaica, West Indies, were some days ago made the guests of honor at an informal dinner given by the Business Men's Association of Kingston, principal city on the island of Jamaica, near which city the Terriss people are operating. This information was conveyed to the Picture Playhouse Film Company in New York in a letter which has just been received.

Mr. Terriss says that the activities of his company in the West Indian island have excited great interest among the inhabitants, mainly for the reason that the visit of the Terriss players is the first which has ever been made to the island for the purpose of making pictures. Jamaica is world famous for its beautiful scenery and the natives are justly proud of this fact. That Mr. Terriss recognized the natural advantages of the island as a producing place for pictures has very naturally gratified the Kingston business men, and the attentions which have been paid the American photoplay visitors have followed as a matter of course. The Jamaicans hope that the exploiting of their pretty island through the Terriss pictures will turn the attention of other picture producers to the "Gem of the West Indies" and that there will be a resulting benefit to general business conditions on the island.

Mr. Terriss writes that everything possible has been done to help him in the production of his pictures and that he feels that he has found a natural garden spot in which to work. The scenes of the first photoplay, "The Pearl of the Antilles," soon to be released, have been laid in places which are strikingly beautiful, and Mr. Terriss believes that the beauty of this scenery will have much to do in making a success of the offering. Climatic conditions for the making of the pictures in Jamaica are, of course, ideal, inasmuch as the island is on the border of the tropics.

MARIE DRESSLER WITH LUBIN.

Marie Dressler, the funniest woman on the stage today and widely known in filmland for her "Tillie's Punctured Romance," has signed a contract with the Lubin Company at a very large salary and is to be starred in a number of featured comedies written especially for her.

Miss Dressler will be seen only in five-reel comedies and she will make three of these each year. Elaborate preparations are being made for the first of these big reelers. The comedienne will arrive at the studios in Philadelphia the first of June, the close of her present theatrical season, and the work of producing the first feature comedy will begin then. For her supporting company Ira M. Lowry, general manager of the Lubin Company, is selecting the most expensive list of players that has ever been used in a Lubin production.

JACKSON OPENS STRAND THEATER.

A. H. Jackson on April 9 last opened his new theater, the Strand, at Fremont, Ohio, to a most enthusiastic assemblage. The Strand is a beautiful structure and contains all the latest appointments and equipment. The indirect lighting system is employed, and the prevailing admission prices are 10 and 20 cents, except on such days when a big feature is booked.

Gertrude McCoy in Double Role

OF COURSE, Gertrude McCoy, the young star of the Edison Stock Company, is known to all those who view motion pictures—far and near. The public loves her for her beauty, her personality and the intense earnestness that lies behind her dramatic work. To her associates in the Edison studio, she is known as a quiet, modest and a desperately hard worker, ready to take any chance of life or limb that may be called for.

Gertrude McCoy.

But there is another Gertrude whose name has recently appeared on the screen as an author of scenarios—Gertrude Lyon—and it may not be generally known that the two are one and the same. For it is the Edison company's policy not to produce scenarios under the names of its actors. Therefore, in venturing into the field of authorship, Miss McCoy assumed that nom de plume. Her first story, "What Could She Do?" was submitted last summer, considered with the hundreds of other plots received at the Edison studio, was accepted and produced in three reels in November. It made a triumphant success. With her pretty head not a bit turned over the reception given this play, Miss McCoy went to work carefully and slowly on another. This was completed in due course and, when read by one of the Edison directors, caused him to remark "That's the best three-reel scenario I ever read. I hope I can produce it." He did, and the result was "On the Stroke of Twelve," released in March. This play made even a bigger success than the first one. Louis Reeves Harrison, the able critic, said of it: "A well devised story, 'On the Stroke of Twelve' is a step in the right direction. The solution (of a murder mystery), satisfies a natural demand for justice, while it is melodramatically effective.' Wherever shown, the picture has evoked warm approval. A prominent Baltimore exhibitor said, after the recent Maryland Exhibitors' Ball, "On the Stroke of Twelve" was the best three-reel picture I ever showed in my house. Give us pictures like that and we shall have all the features we want."

In the two sterling successes mentioned Miss McCoy's triumph has doubled, for she herself played the role of the heroine. Miss McCoy's interpretations convince with emphasis because they are always fired with the intensity of her own nature, character shaded by a keen and intuitive sense of emotional motives. Perhaps one of the best indications of her ability to sink herself in the character being delineated is that she possesses an ability, without the use of character "make-up," to appear on the screen at different times so different that many who know her well did not for some time recognize her as the Miss McCoy who played a different role at the last viewing.

Some of her latest Edison films are Mrs. Fiske's "In Spite of All;" "A Tragedy of the Rails," where she did daredevil work; "The Phantom Thief," and Lee Arthur's three-reeler, "Greater Than Art."

FOSTER—ANDERSON.

A note from the Thanhouser studio at New Rochelle, N. Y., reports the marriage of Morris Foster and Mignon Anderson. The love affair of these popular players has absorbed the Thanhouserites for some time and its culmination was a happy event. The couple have gone to Florida on their honeymoon.

STURGEON BOASTS NEW LEADING MAN.

Rollin Sturgeon, director of the Western Vitagraph Company at Los Angeles, reports the arrival of a boy at his home. He has already prepared a scenario in which the young man will take a leading part.

Cobe Chasing Car Wheels

Head of the Alliance Film Corporation on Tour of Exchanges.

ANDREW J. COBE, President of the Alliance Films Corporation is now making a tour of the Alliance Exchanges east of and including Duluth. Mr. Cobe, since his departure from New York, has met and conferred with Harry Schwalbe, the head of the Eclectic Film Exchange of Philadelphia. Pittsburgh was the next exchange centre visited and together with A. A. Weiland of the Northern Film Exchange he studied conditions in that territory. Leaving Pittsburgh his next stop was Chicago, where Felix Feist, the managing head of the Celebrated Players Film Company met him. Mr. Cobe is still the guest of Mr. Feist and will probably stay in the Windy City for the best part of a week.

Andrew J. Cobe.

The itinerary of his westward trip includes a visit to Duluth where he will meet J. F. Cobberly, the manager of the Zenith Exchange. Leaving here he will go directly to Des Moines where the Alliance Programme is handled by the Des Moines Film Supply Co. Kansas City will next be visited where A. D. Flintom, the President of the Monarch Feature Film Co., will be the host of Mr. Cobe.

From Kansas City the Alliance head will go to Dallas, and there meet J. W. Hill, Jr., of the Alliance Films Company of Texas. Several very important matters concerning the Southern territory will be considered here, as well as in Atlanta which is scheduled as Mr. Cobe's next stopping place.

The Alliance Southern Film Exchange in Atlanta, of which P. T. Barbour is the head, controls the Alliance output in Georgia, Alabama, Florida, Louisiana, Mississippi, North and South Carolina. Mr. Cobe will give considerable attention to the observation of film affairs below the Mason and Dixon line.

Leaving Atlanta, Mr. Cobe will return directly to New York.

MANUFACTURE OF MACHINE PARTS NOT INFRINGEMENT.

In a recent suit brought in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York against the Baird Machine Company, Judge Mayer held that the manufacture of the parts of a patented device did not constitute an infringement of the patent on that device, and that action based on that complaint was dismissed.

CAPTAIN PEACOCKE WITH VENUS FILM CORPORATION.

Capt. Leslie T. Peacocke, scenario writer and editor, has resigned his position with the World Film Corporation to join the Venus Film Corporation, which has planned to make some pictures in Bermuda. When the Captain finishes some work he has on hand he will join the new company.

HOPP HADLEY TO OPEN AIRDOME.

Hopp Hadley, whose experience in running airdomes has been more fortunate than that of most, has taken a large field in Yonkers, McLean avenue and Broadway, and will run an airdome there this coming summer. Hopp has a dandy site for his venture and will make hay again without a doubt. He has proved his weather eye and his going in for it again this summer ought to encourage others. He is going to use United service and it is new in that neighborhood and a good part of it is local.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

A LOCAL WRITER complains that many of the best motion picture producing companies who have established reputations for artistic work in the dramatic line are injuring themselves by certain comedy productions which, he says, bring laughs from coarse-minded men and empty-headed women, "but disgust the thousands of finer feeling." He adds that the use of the picture play to the position it occupies today "among the intelligent and refined people has not been over-rapid and its decline with such people will not be slow if the companies cannot offer refined and pleasant comedies."

The criticism is worthy of attention on the part of both makers and exhibitors of films, but like many other similar comments it must not be accepted for general application. The writer does not specify what kind of comedy impresses him as "rude, bad taste in your mouth stuff" but his expressed desire for "refined and pleasant comedy" indicates an opposition to what are known in the trade as "slap stick" productions which, while not offensive from a moral standpoint of view, are not pleasing to some people of refinement. The demand for comedy pictures has been one of the greatest perplexities of the motion picture producer's life. Difficult as it has been for the managers of the "legitimate" houses to secure successful comedies much more trying has been the work of the picture producers. Many a production on the regular stage has utterly failed in action, but has been carried through to success by snappy, bright and witty dialogue. To "get the punch over" motion picture comedies are dependent solely upon action. The audience must see the fun. Thousands of the best comedies produced upon the stage in the past are of no value to the photoplay producers because of their "refined and pleasant comedy" being almost wholly incorporated in the lines. Many attempts have been made with little success to picturize some of the greatest comedies of the old school because they could be appreciated only by "the refined and intelligent people" who made acquaintance with the lines, and situations through witnessing the stage productions. Possibly most of such people can see nothing but a spirit of improbability and sequences of silliness in many of the motion picture comedies of today, yet such productions are packing the picture houses throughout the country and bringing big returns to the makers and exhibitors.

Sales returns and box office receipts from these slap stick comedies would indicate that the writer making the criticism is a little off in his census of the "coarse-minded men and empty-headed women." If he is not, then the mental standard of the greater population of the country must be in a deplorable state. Personal observation, however, indicates that the critic, while right to an extent, is wrong in his general calculation. After reading his criticism I visited a picture house that is regularly patronized by many of the best residents of the locality. I timed my visit to the production of one of the class of slap stick comedies that have become so prominent recently. The house was filled with what might have been called a representation of the select class of motion picture patrons. Looking about from my seat in the orchestra I observed a number of well-to-do business people, several politicians of the better class, and not a few professionals of the theatrical field. I also recognized a number of ladies whom I have never had occasion to suspect of being "empty-headed." A survey of the balcony gave the impression that most, if not all, the people seated there were of respectable appearance and were not absolutely devoid of intelligence. "I'll see how this comedy takes with this audience," I remarked to my friend. As the announcement of the comedy's title and name of the principal comedian was flashed upon the screen there was an outburst of applause. During the action of the picture the laughter was loud and prolonged. I saw many of the better dressed and more intelligent looking people wiping from their cheeks and eyes tears that had been provoked by excess laughter. Yet, I will confess, some of the situations and actions of the players in that slap stick comedy were silly almost to childishness. Many of them I recognized as adaptations from old time variety and minstrelsy sketches over which thousands roared with laughter in days gone by. At the conclusion of the picture a lady seated near me laughingly applied her handkerchief to her eyes and remarked to her escort, "Silly, isn't it?" The escort replied, "Yes, but it's a change. 'A little nonsense now and then,' you know."

To make sure of my estimate of the appreciation of such comedies I made two other visits, one of them being to Keeney's new house on Livingston street, Brooklyn. The management and patronage of the house will bear close inspection from a standpoint of refinement and my previous conclusion as to the current demand for comedy was fully confirmed. It is the laugh the people want and if that can be afforded to them in a spirit that keeps away from the line of vulgarity the producers and exhibitors are justified in giving it. The critic is justified in his comments so far as they serve incidentally to warn the producers that they must not be carried away by success and become lax in their selection of subjects and the carrying out of details. But if the object of the critic is to have the line of comedies referred to abolished for the "refined and pleasant" article he is advocating something which cannot be accomplished. It is a matter that depends solely upon the pulse of the patrons of each house. The manager is to decide. His decision cannot be made upon the individual appearance of his patrons. It is his duty to note how the productions are received. If his patrons are of the class that consider the slap stick comedy as rude and offensive to refinement and intelligence he can readily discontinue, but not as readily change to the refined and pleasant comedy, for reasons already stated. But it is doubtful that any moving picture house in the country can maintain its success with comedies of that quality and dramatic and educational subjects. The pulse of amusement patrons is uncertain and the people are whimsical. The demand for the line of comedy that is now sweeping the country is likely to decline as rapidly as it grew, and yet may continue indefinitely. But at no time are average audiences content with a program that is devoid of farcical comedy. The success of the slap stick style of comedy will be measured by the ability of the producers to present new and novel situations. Each of the productions must have an individuality. If they recede to repetitions, copying, or imitations, their popularity will drop fast. The situation is best foreshadowed by the comic sheets of many of the daily and weekly newspapers. The cartoonists have become so overworked for themes that were the circulations of the newspapers dependent upon those who notice the cartoons the publishers would be obliged to suspend business.

The statement by the critic on comedies that the position picture plays occupy with the intelligent and refined people has not been over-rapid in acquirement is not borne out by statistics. In all the history of amusements in this country there has never been such a rapid growth in the number of theaters and specially erected houses for photoplays as there has been during the past two years and this wonderful growth has been due in a large measure to the great increase in the number of people who formerly suspported other places of amusements that depended upon the refined and intelligent and are now willing to pay the same prices to see photoplays. Think of it! Speculators selling tickets for some photoplay productions at prices for which they one time sold tickets for grand opera! In the less pretentious houses you find theater parties made up of people who pass the doors of the regular theaters. People who five years ago, and perhaps less, looked down upon picture houses as practically slot machine rooms and shunned them are now regular patrons of the places, many of them patronizing the houses twice a week. Refined comedies did not bring about this change, nor will the lack of them now keep the people away.

BLANCHE SWEET IN "STOLEN GOODS."

Samuel Goldfish announces on behalf of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company that the third production in which Blanche Sweet will appear under this management is to be entitled "Stolen Goods." This film drama is based on a successful play by Margaret Turnbull, the well-known authoress, and is said to be extremely forceful. In addition to Miss Sweet, the cast will include House Peters, Theodore Roberts, Sydney Deane, H. B. Carpenter and Cleo Ridgeley. A large part of the action of this drama takes place in Belgium and includes very realistic scenes showing conditions in the hospitals and refugees' camps as they actually are at the present time.

It is astonishing at times to note what measures renters will take to introduce the element of novelty into their activities. The idea bears the name of the "heat-extractor" and is embodied in a small compact device that can be inserted in the carrier of the lantern. It is claimed that ordinary inflammable films are rendered quite impervious to the heat of the arc when the "heat-extractor" is in use.

Commencing Jan. 1st of the present year the British Board of Trade decided to keep an accurate and reliable check upon moving picture films imported from abroad with the object of compiling similar trade statistics to those recorded with other industries. To the end of last month (February) something approximating to the value of £127,000 passed the customs and eighty-five per cent. of this (about £110,000 in value) are of United States origin and seven per cent. from France. Taking only these two months' returns—and which being computed by the Government may be regarded as accurate as it is possible to obtain—it is not difficult to form some conception of the amount of film imported from the U. S. A. in the course of a year. No discrimination appears to have been made in the returns between negatives and positives. Turning to the other side we have the exports of films from this country for the first two months of the year assessed at £52,000.

The "fashion note' in the London and provincial press is an advertising stunt that shows promise of vigorous exploitation. A graphic description is the journalists' most picturesque style of the "derniere cri" followed by the announcement of the photoplay in which it appears undoubtedly possess irresistible attractions to the feminine eye. And unlike the majority of publicity notions the idea is capable of infinite variation. Perhaps a better, if more costly expedient, is to accompany the description with an illustration.

VICE-PRESIDENT MARSHALL BECOMES CAMERA MAN.

Vice-President Marshall had his first experience last week as a moving picture camera man. He was a visitor for five hours at Universal City and was very much interested in all that went on, but he was not satisfied with this. He wanted to turn the crank. So President Carl Laemmle requested the camera man to step down and surrender the crank to the Vice-President, who directed and filmed fifty feet of a play. He was anxious to see the film developed, but as this was impossible Mr. Laemmle promised to send him a print of "Vice-Presidential film" just as soon as possible. The Vice-President's party, which consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Marshall, Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh of Washington, Lieut. Commander Berthold, his aide, General Robt. Wankowaski of the California National Guard, and a delegation from the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce, was met at the entrance to the city by Mr. Laemmle, P. A. Powers, I. Bernstein, Herman Fichtenberg and Harry Caulfield, and an impromptu celebration on the part of the residential moving picture Indians, cowboys and plainsmen was staged for the benefit of the distinguished visitor.

BEAUTIFUL SCENES IN CALIFORNIA SUBJECT.

So superlatively beautiful have been the outdoor scenes secured by the California Motion Picture Corporation in its filming of two Bret Harte photo-plays, "Salomy Jane" and "The Lily of Poverty Flat" (the April release), that the citizens in the region, where the photographs were taken have asked and been accorded the privilege of using them in advertising the charms of their respective localities.

The citizens of Marin county have made use of several large views. taken in the filming of "Salomy Jane." This photo-play was produced in the heart of the most romantic redwood region on the Pacific Coast, and Marin county has thought so much of the motion picture that scenes from it are now on display in the Marin county section of the California building at the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

Boulder Creek, where "The Lily of Poverty Flat" was filmed, has stirred the Santa Cruz citizens to a new realization of the wonders of the scenery in their own mountains, and enlargements of some of the photo-play views are also to be shown at the World's Fair.

BRINGS FRISCO CARTOONISTS' PICTURES.

S. J. Sanguineti, general manager of the Movca Film Service, Inc., with headquarters in San Francisco, arrived in New York a few days ago on a business trip which is expected to result in the Movca products' being prominently introduced to eastern audiences.

The Movca company is an organization of California capital which has been formed to exploit the cartoon comedies of John Terry and H. M. Shields, both well known newspaper artists who have most recently been employed in San Francisco, Mr. Terry on the San Francisco Examiner and Mr. Shields on the San Francisco Chronicle. Mr. Terry, who is widely known after having worked in all of the important cities of the United States, is an officer of the company.

Mr. Sanguineti has with him in New York the first six pictures which his company has turned out and is negotiating with a number of big programs with the thought of placing the pictures for regular release, the company being prepared to follow the first six releases with two releases a month.

"Beulah"

Six-Part Picturization of the Novel by Augusta J. Evans—Produced by Balboa and Released on the Alliance Program.

Reviewed by Lynde Denig.

WITH Henry B. Walthall in the principal role and Joyce Moore, a young actress of marked appeal prominent in his support, the Balboa Company assembled an able cast for the film version of a story that enjoyed a wide vogue a number of years ago. As usual Mr. Walthall gives a consistent performance, dignified, strong and frequently expressive in conveying emotion. Few screen actors would have done as much with a character depending so largely on the ability of its interpreter, for the Dr. Guy Hartwell of Augusta J. Evans's novel is not especially well suited to motion picture portrayal. To the artistry of Mr. Walthall and to his impressive personality many of the most effective scenes in "Beulah" are due.

Scene from "Beulah" (Alliance).

Miss Moore, first as the rather tragic little girl whose home is in an orphanage, and later as the mature young woman who comes to love her benefactor, the doctor, is an unusual type and a very convincing one for a character of the kind. In her semblance of grief over the loss of her little sister and in other passages demanding feeling, she displays a rare emotional quality. The strength of her facial expressions is properly emphasized in close-ups.

The adaptation of the novel produces a narrative, rather than a dramatic photoplay, save in exceptional instances. The cause behind the doctor's misanthropic nature is revealed with sufficient clearness and the progress of the story, with the development of the various people and the unhappiness brought about by conflicting aims, is made reasonably interesting, although the director seems to have missed a few opportunities for building up telling situations. By a careful editing of the last reels of the picture and the addition of one or two sub-titles a number of confusing incidents might be made clear. It would be well, for example, to explain the nature of the epidemic that suddenly sweeps over the city and causes a panic. No doubt the necessary changes will be made before the film is circulated. "Beulah" has many points to recommend it, among them a story that is out of the ordinary, good photography and settings, and the two very fine pieces of acting already mentioned.

Miss Gordon Came Back.

Carolyn Gordon, another one of the well-known artists, signed by Phil Gleichman to appear in World Comedy Stars' films, has not been before the public for nearly three years, because (whisper) she left the stage then to get married, and has been so busy ever since that she has not had time to think of much else except housekeeping. But she has been lured back, and those who will remember her work in "Get Rich Quick Wallingford" will not be in the least bit disappointed.

"An Innocent Sinner"

Katherine La Salle Charming as "Hinda" in Three-Reel Kalem Production.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE moving picture business to-day is full of "ideas"—the five-reel feature is an "idea" and so is "a famous player in a famous play." One often hears in conversation a statement that so and so didn't like some particular idea, but had to come around to it. The Kalem Company is making, not as special features, but as offerings in the regular program, some three-reel pictures with a well-known player—this is the Kalem idea. There is good matter in this idea—the picture every week can be boosted with the best offerings, by the name of the player and by the quality of the offering and perhaps it will be even more acceptable to the spectator. Other things being equal, it has a better chance of being exciting than a six or seven-reel offering.

All this is germane to the discussion of the value to the exhibitor of this particular offering, "An Innocent Sinner," written by Lawrence Marsten and produced by Keanen Buel. The well-known player, Katherine La Salle, a Broadway favorite, has the role of Hinda, an orphan girl in a Southern village. The plot is melodramatic, and Miss La Salle's attractive personality and ability at dramatic moments give to it a remarkble atmosphere of romance which is the thing most of all desired in such offerings. It is strictly a story of village life; the action doesn't leave a certain group of houses, criss-cross of country streets and back yards. It has the usual village characters and the villainous outsider, a doctor with hypnotic powers, who gets the girl under his sway. She has a worthy lover in the village; but unfortunately she has given her affections to this young man's brother, who has deceived her, though engaged to another girl. The doctor overhears a conversation and discovers the situation. In a thunder storm, he compels the girl to knock down and strangle the deceiver. She, under hypnotism, knows nothing of it—is tried and acquitted. The other brother now marries the girl; but again the villainous doctor interferes, but in doing so brings about his own downfall and confession. It holds interest very well and I believe that it will be generally counted a good offering.

An All-American Production.

Members of the American Studio forces are pleased at what is considered a good omen for the success of the photoplay novel, "The Diamond from the Sky," in that among the thirty-eight Indian players used in the opening scenes, two were full-blooded Apache Indians; Phillipe Lone Star and Bob Flores. The appearance of Lone Star in the very first foot of celluloid adds sentiment to the film, as this great American production will be a story of American love and adventure, distributed by the North American Film Corporation. This attention to detail in casting one in whose veins runs the blood of the original American, as the first figure in this remarkable story, indicates the great care exercised in the preparation of the productions.

"The Diamond from the Sky"

A Review of the Prologue and First Three Chapters of the Big American Serial, Comprising About Six Reels and One-Half.

By James S. MacQuade.

AFTER viewing on two different occasions the three opening chapters and the prologue of "The Diamond from the Sky," I am impressed that advantage has been taken of all preceding filmed serials by avoiding the mistakes made in various respects and by introducing improvements that will serve to heighten the value and interest of the story.

Scene from "The Diamond from the Sky" (American).

The story is intensely gripping, right from the start, and much of this is due to the fact that the scenes are laid in our own country, and that the action and incidents have a modern, familiar atmosphere. Of course I except from this classification the action and incidents of the prologue, which are supposed to have occurred in Virginia about 280 years ago.

I confess a liking for the use of the word, "Chapter," instead of installment or some other equivalent word. A chapter, consisting of two acts (two reels), will be released weekly. The first release will be made Monday, May 3, and will consist of the prologue and the first chapter, with some introductory matter—altogether about two reels and 600 feet. Each chapter is preceded on the screen by a brief, clear synopsis of the story contained in that chapter—a big help to the spectator.

I am not at liberty to announce the name of the author of this serial subject, in this article. That will be made public in the Chicago Tribune, on Sunday, May 2, and it will then be shown that the author is a very successful and well known scenario and short story writer. His knowledge of technical work in production has enabled him to avoid the impossible in his narrative, and to co-operate with the chief director, Jacques Jaccard, in securing the best possible results for the screen.

More than passing congratulation is called for when referring to the production of these three first chapters and prologue. That is a fine exterior which shows the attempted burning by Indians of the young cavalier, Sir Arthur Stanley, in the Virginia forest, 280 years ago. The falling of the meteor nearby, and the discovery of the great diamond in the molten mass by the man whom its timely fall had saved from the flames, do not appear improbable, although some of us may feel inclined to think that the cavalier should have performed some lusty digging before he got at the meteorite.

The chief merit of the direction is the clear, well-connected telling of the story in the pictures; and that was quite a task because of the great lapse of time that occurs between the opening scenes and those of modern days, necessitating repeated changes in the cast. The film telling of the story in the first chapter is somewhat marred by the smallness of the script used in the letter to Col. Arthur Stanley, of Virginia, by his kinsman, Lord Stanley, of Warwickshire, Eng., in the year 1852. This short letter, if seen distinctly, is a great aid to the spectator, who relies solely on the pictures for guidance. On neither occasion that I viewel the pictures could I read it; but the screen in each case was small and the throw short.

The pictures succeed in working up the spectator's interest to a high pitch at the close of each of the first three chapters, and, if the same strong interest is retained throughout the series, I have not the slightest doubt of the growing popularity of "The Diamond from the Sky."

The fine photography adds to the pleasure of viewing these films. Whether in exterior or interior work the camera men have shown commendable proficiency and efficiency.

Samuel S. Hutchinson is to be congratulated on the selection of the cast. Lottie Pickford wins instantaneous favor in the part of Esther Stanley. Youthful, of sweet girlish face and delightful manner, without self-consciousness when before the camera, she succeeds in transforming herself into the life of the innocent Virginia maiden, who has become the plaything of destiny. As the succeeding chapters will make her role still more important, they will be awaited with still keener interest.

Irving Cummings and Wm. Russell make fine opposites, as Arthur Stanley the Second and Blair Stanley. Mr. Cummings thus far carries off the honors by reason, perhaps, of the finer opportunities offered in his role. He gives us some tremendous thrills. The right hand blow to the jaw that puts Blair Stanley into momentary sleep is a peach. I have never seen such a realistic punch in films before. In his automobile flight he plunges in front of a fast passenger train with a recklessness that makes one gasp. I have been told that this was such a close call that six inches of the rear fender of his car was shorn off as with a mighty knife. The great culminating act of recklessness occurs at the end of chapter three, when he plunges his car over the precipice into a river, seemingly 80 feet below, and just escapes landing under it by jumping sidewise at the moment he left the roadway. The car is completely wrecked, and the last we see of Arthur Stanley (with the great diamond of the sky around his neck) in chapter three, he is floating down the river semi-conscious, holding on to the gasoline tank of his wrecked car!

Space forbids giving the story thus far, but the widespread publicity given it by the North American Film Corporation will meet the requirements of all.

"The Torrent"

Spectacular Two-Reel Gold Seal in Which Are Supplied Some Distinct Thrills.

Reviewed by Margaret I. MacDonald.

WRITTEN and produced by Henry McRae, this production is singularly attractive, not because it is based on a wonderful story, for the story is neither new nor wonderful, not because at the producing end there has been any big play made to demonstrate the strongly dramatic, but rather does it attract us because of the remarkable manner in which the bursting of the dam, and its terrific results have been presented in the film.

The story is of the building of a great dam, and of the havoc worked by a vengeful spirit among the workmen, forming with malicious delight his plans for the downfall of the young assistant superintendent who has been left in charge of the completion of the dam while the superintendent is absent on a business trip to Europe. At the close of the story when the unhappy plotter is about to die from injuries and exposure resulting from his own misdeeds, he confesses what he has done, thereby smoothing the pathway of the two lovers of the story, namely, the assistant superintendent and the superintendent's daughter.

Wellington Playter appears to advantage in the leading masculine role, while Marie Wolcamp playing opposite to him must be commended largely for the dangerous feats which she performs astride a rearing horse in the torrents let loose through the breaking of the dam. At times horse and girl almost disappear from sight in the water.

The picture has been well made, is vividly realistic, and well photographed. The numerous scenes which are shown of the flood may give an impression of padding, but summed up generally the production is an exceedingly attractive one.

"Captain Macklin"

An Interesting Four-Reel Majestic Gives Vent to the Prevailing Military Spirit—Story by Richard Harding Davis.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

SOUTH AMERICAN republics, like the "Zenda" kingdoms somewhere in the Balkan regions, furnish a background for picturesque romance and military costumes, and they permit the intrusion of love stories into affairs of state. We cannot locate modern romance within our own boundaries and get away with it, not so much because it would be incongruous as because our affairs of state are too disagreeably practical for those of love and adventure, and then revolutions are altogether too infrequent for the purpose of a story. Why bother about it when the republics of Central America furnish an abundant supply of battle scenes and swift change of governmental control?

"Captain Macklin" is one of Richard Harding Davis's favorite soldiers of fortune. With a West Point training nipped in the bud by strict enforcement of discipline, in love with the daughter of a wealthy owner of coast steamships, Macklin is inspired by the example of an ancestor of high military achievement and decides to seek redemption in active service for his misdeeds at school. He accordingly joins a foreign legion in the mythical republic of Anduras, commanded by General Laguerre and displays his military ardor on a prancing charger at the head of his troops. His ostensible object is to restore General Garcia—known to all cigar smokers—to the Presidency from which he has been deposed by the usurper Alvarez, but his real object becomes the rescue of his sweetheart.

The author very cleverly brings the sweetheart and her stern father to the scene that they may be captured by perfidious Alvarez and his villainous accomplices. This gives gallant Captain Macklin the opportunity of his life. He demonstrates beyond the faintest shadow of a doubt that it is a good thing to have a soldier in the family. He arrives at the nick of time, just as his sweetheart is struggling in the arms of a brute and her father is about to be dishonorably executed by some unwashed Peons.

To those who have not seen the same story visualized several times under various titles—proving its merit, by the way—"Captain Macklin" may prove to be a source of entertainment. There is a lot of hard work done in characterization—Captain Macklin is a dashing officer—and there is some remarkable shooting done at close range without scoring many clean hits, but that may be characteristic of Central American revolutions for all that we know, so the romance may be realistic in this particular of treatment, even if it is not in other details.

"The Heart of a Painted Woman"

Sensational Metro Subject, Featuring Olga Petrova, Has Good Point.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

IN some ways at least this feature well justifies the expectations which so striking and attractive a title is apt to raise. A woman whom many would consider more sinned against than sinning is taunted by a reckless rich youth for what womanly reserve and modesty still cling to her. The woman does not resent the taunt, but tells the youthful pleasure-hunter that if she had his wealth she would make much better use of it than toss it away in the pursuit of sensual gratification. The young reveler accepts the gentle "dare" and sends the woman a check for a large amount of money. This money the woman uses to build an institution for the care of poor orphans and we see with wonder and delight and not without the temptation of a tear the blessed benefits to the host of little children slighted by Fate and often bankrupt in health and hope.

The portion of the feature devoted to the showing of these scenes is excellently done and is deserving of high praise. There are likewise some extremely strong dramatic scenes in the play, many of them novel and all of them sensational. That the direction of the play evinces great capabilities cannot be doubted, but it is not helped by a strange tendency to ultra-sensationalism of the morbid order. I am glad to be able to add that the objectionable scenes are all very short and may be removed without in the slightest degree hurting the logical development of the plot or the strength of the climax.

Scene from "The Heart of a Painted Woman" (Metro).

The use of a hypodermic syringe to induce unconsciousness in the hero is entirely unnecessary; the plot requires only that the hero lose his power of thinking and that is accomplished by letting his senses get benumbed through an excess of drinking at the party. The maneuvring with a revolver during the banquet scene is also wholly without justification and any good pair of scissors can clip it out to the advantage of the play. There is but a flash of a vision showing a man about to be electrocuted in a prison, but the flash is entirely superfluous and ought to come out. All the eliminations put together will scarcely amount to more than two hundred feet. The acting of Olga Petrova in the leading part is excellent; it seems as if the part had been created for her. The photography is of such exceptional merit as to call for special mention.

in California. Probably the fine backgrounds provide the most notable element in the film, although there is a plot of fair dramatic quality and the acting of Beatriz Michelena as Lily, Frederick Lewis as Joe and other players in a well balanced cast, is all that the story requires.

Without displaying any great variety of expression, Miss

Michelena always appears attractive on the screen and she might further enhance her natural good looks by a more judicious use of make-up. In nearly all of the scenes in this picture her lips are far too heavily rouged, a mistake made particularly obvious by close-ups. This is a small matter, however, in view of the actress's generally satisfactory portrayal of Bret Harte's heroine. Mr. Lewis gives a strong, consistent and altogether effective interpretation of the young miner, who is not regarded as a suitable husband for Lily after her father has acquired a fortune enabling him to take his daughter to Paris. Good types were chosen for the gambler and lesser persons figuring in Bret Harte's tale.

The first reel opens with some exciting incidents, typical of the early days in the far West, and establishes the relationship of the characters destined to play an important part in the life of "The Lily of Poverty Flat." The story progresses in an interesting fashion, with occasional bits of western melodrama, and terminates in a reel replete with fast action and tense moments while the outcome of a struggle meaning life or death for Joe, is pending. In its entirety, the production provides first rate entertainment.
